Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the letter be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so referred.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (S. 3419) admitting to citizenship and fully naturalizing George Edward Lerrigo, of the city of Topeka, in the State of Kansas, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 44) transferring office furniture, equipment, etc., heretofore used by the Immigration Commission to the Department of Labor, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back adversely the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the time for the convening of Congress and commencement of the terms of the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, and I submit a report (No. 212) thereon. I ask that the joint resolution may be placed on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. ASHURST. On behalf of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Shields], who is necessarily absent, I wish to give notice that he will submit the views of the minority in respect to the joint resolution which has just been reported adversely by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh], and, on behalf of that Senator, I request that he be granted five days in which to prepare and submit the views.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

BRIDGE ACROSS TUG FORK OF BIG SANDY RIVER.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce without amendment the bill (S. 4019) to authorize the Tug River & Kentucky Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near the mouth of Blackberry Creek, in Pike County, Ky., and I submit a report (No. 211) thereon. I ask unanimous con-I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its con-

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKA DEVELOPMENT BOARD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to introduce a bill and to make a very brief statement about it.

The bill (S. 4318) to provide for the administration of national property and interests in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is, as stated in its title, to create a board, with a fixed habitat in Alaska to take control of the resources of Alaska, transferring the powers, jurisdiction, authority, and work of the departments here, as well as of the independent commissions and other bureaus, to the Alaska development board.

One of the great obstacles in the way of the development of Alaska has been that it takes so long to accomplish anything in the way of perfecting title, in the way of acquiring rights of way, and in other matters affecting the public domain there, that it has practically amounted to a denial of justice to would-be settlers in that section of the country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. May I ask the Senator from Oregon whether there is any determination in his bill as to the policy which is to be pursued as to leases or royalties?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Nothing at all. I will say to the Senator from Colorado this is simply a bill to transfer to a local board in Alaska the duties and functions which are now performed here in Washington by the several departments, commissions, and bureaus. It takes about eight months, sometimes, to secure action on an application for a right of way through a forest up there where the application is made by a prospector or other person. The object of this bill is to obviate those difficulties and to place all the different resources in the hands of one board, who shall reside in Alaska, with a final appeal to the Secretary of the Interior in all matters.

I desired to make this brief statement in reference to the bill. I will state further that there is now under consideration a number of bills which have for their purpose the leasing or other disposal of coal lands and other resources in Alaska, and they will follow in their order. I thought it was proper, in view of the passage of the act authorizing the construction of a railway in Alaska by the President, that this should be one of the first steps looking to the development of the Territory in connection with the railroad or railroads which are to be constructed. The other bills will follow in order.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Terri-

The motion was agreed to.

IRRIGATION BY THE RESERVOIR SYSTEM.

Mr. BRISTOW. On Saturday I introduced a bill (S. 4281) providing for the continuance of investigation authorized by the act of August 10, 1912, upon the feasibility and economy of irrigation by the reservoir system or plan in western Kansas and western Oklahoma, for the extension of the investigation to western Nebraska, eastern Colorado, and eastern New Mexico, and for the construction of reservoirs and lakes for the purpose of impounding the waters of these States.

I asked that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and it was so referred. Since then I have learned that the act of August 10, 1912, which made the original appropriation, was the bill carrying the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and since that committee had the original investigation in charge and the appropriation was made originally through that committee, I ask that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I have talked with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] in regard to it, and he has no objection to the change of reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will

AMENDMENT TO POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KENYON submitted an amendment providing that hereafter fourth-class mail matter shall embrace seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, plants, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

COOPERATIVE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

NELLIE BOND.

Mr. HOLLIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 257) which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Nellie Bond, sister of John C. Ryan, late a messenger in the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution No. 241 be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 241, directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to conduct an examination to ascertain whether facts or evidence exist justifying the Government in instituting proceedings for recovery of fines, etc., from the United States Steel Corporation, its subsidiaries, or any common carrier, be-cause of unlawful rebates within the last six years, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the pending amendment to the resolution reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, will it be in order for me to say a word?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate. Mr. LANE. Does the Senator from Nevada desire a vote on the amendment at this time?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I desire a vote at as early a time as will suit the convenience of Senators.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I owe it to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to the Senate, to the committee, and to myself to make an explanation, for their information, in regard to some of the proceedings of the preceding meeting of the

I then used a term which was unparliamentary and against the rules of this body. I had not quite finished my remark when I was called to order for having used it, and I withdrew it. I was referring at that time-and I am now going to reiterate, if I may be allowed to do so and the rules will permit, the statement which I was at that time making, and do it in a more parliamentary manner, keeping myself well under the protecting wing of the rules of this distinguished body, and refer to the fact that the report of the committee's proceedings did not, in my opinion, present a full, free, and complete record of the manner in which this resolution of mine had been treated, and I thought that an injustice had been done to me. I felt that the courtesy of the Senate and its distinguished rules and precedents were as much intended to cover the acts of one Senator as those of another, and that we met here upon an equal plane—some more distinguished than others, some very much less so, to the latter class of which I am perfectly willing to concede that I belong—yet I felt that in a report of proceedings which had to do with matters in which the welfare of the people of this country was concerned, wherein they are being unjustly treated and a charge to that effect had been made in good faith, with the honest intent to remedy a condition which is wrong and, I guess, criminal-that a full, fair, open, and complete statement of both sides of the question was due.

The resolution which I introduced was referred to the committee, the chairman of that committee having asked that it be referred to his committee. I tried my little best to have the matter decided here in the open Senate. I did not want it to go into the committee for the reason, as I alleged at the time, that it would probably cause delay. I am saying this without any reference to the members here. When I want a thing to go in one direction and some other gentleman evinces a desire to have it go somewhere else, I do not at all times fall right into line with his suggestion. If I want to give a man, a committee, or a body of gentlemen something, I like to do it freely; and when I assure them that I do not want them to have it I would prefer-this is merely personal; just a little habit of mind which I have-to go the way I started.

But, at any rate, the resolution went into the hands of the committee. The committee came in with a report to this body, a copy of which I have here. In that report the first two pages are taken up with some reading matter which, I was afterwards informed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], was purely informal. I understood him to say that that is the was purely informal. I understood him to say that that is the informal portion of the report. But it was presented formally; it states plainly what it is; it sets forth that it is a preface to the report—an introductory, if you please. In that introductory preface I do not find stated some facts, some matters, some occurrences which took place at that time which to me seemed important. It is quite evident that they did not seem so important to the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to make

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me? The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The only statement which I made was the statement which I submitted on the floor of the Senate. That was, that at the first meeting of the committee to consider this resolution no stenographer was present. I suggested that a stenographer be called. In the meantime the statements of Mr. Clark, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission. and of a representative of the Department of Justice, had been made. Their two statements were not taken down by a reporter for the reason that no reporter was present. It was on my suggestion that a reporter was called. The proceedings after that time, so far as I know, were taken down and correctly reported. That is the only statement I made.

Mr. LANE. That is what I meant. I understood the Senator from Arkansas to say that. I accepted exactly what the Senator stated as being the truth. I noticed that—and I am willing to concede that-at the first meeting there was no stenographer I thought I saw a gentleman taking notes, but he might have been engaged on some business of Senators. That, however, does not matter. I know of no stenographer being there. The fact is there was nobody else there except the committee, two other gentlemen, and myself; one of those gentlemen proved to be an assistant to the Attorney General, who had been engaged in a conference with the committee before arrived. He had made some statements to the committee which I did not hear and, of course, I do not know what they were. At the time I came in some questions were asked of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission in regard to it, and he gave an explanation, a part of which is in the preface of this report. Two other things which he stated, in reply to interrogatories by myself, do not appear in the prefatory remarks or in the introductory matter; they are not printed in the report

If the committee quotes the statements of either the Assistant Attorney General or the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission in regard to this matter, I do not see why they should not all be quoted-the two sides to the question, if you please; the two points, the one upon which I was insisting and the point upon which the chairman and the committee were insisting. They do not appear in these prefatory remarks. I will ask the chairman of the committee if they do? I am willing to verify, by the members of the committee, that the protest which I made in the first place against the matter of not having open hearings does not appear there, nor does the statement of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission that this was a subject well within the power of his commission to handle; that they would do so if it were referred to them; and that it was not an improper method of taking charge of this kind of a proceeding. I also suggested to the committee at that time if that were true, why not turn the subject over to the commission right there, and report back to the Senate, if they cared to do so afterwards, that they had taken that action.

There is no statement to that effect in the report. These statements which occurred at the first meeting are left out of this prefatory or introductory matter. I do not think any member of the committee will question my statement in this respect. I should like to have anyone do so if there is anything about it which does not conform entirely to the facts. If no member of the committee makes such a statement, I shall assert that what I have stated is true, and ask them hereafter to hold their peace in regard to my assertion, for I certainly am entitled to that much.

I did not consider that fair; I did not consider that a full, free statement; I did not consider that such a statement as would have been published, say, if a reporter of some of the newspapers had been present. If the gentlemen who are used to handling news had been present, I think they would have presented the full and entire case-if you may call it a "case. There was, it seems to me, what the newspaper men call a "featuring" of certain parts of it, with but little attention given to other things, as to which I may be entirely mistaken, but which I say are important for the people of this country to know.

The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission said he had the right and had the power to take this matter under consideration, and would do so if it were tendered to him by the committee or by anyone else. I thought that the action in not printing his statement to that effect was not just right; and that was one reason why I was a little bit out of humor about it. Later along, amongst the interrogatories which were taken down by the reporter, there was a question advanced by the chairman of the committee which I thought also, in justice to myself, ought to appear.

The chairman of the committee is an able attorney; he is a man who weighs his words well and uses them carefully; I have listened to him a great many times; I have great respect for his ability; and his speeches, when published, read like texts from a man who handles the English language well and clearly and with a definite object in view. Among attorneys and in the practice at the bar-I am not an attorney; I am by profession a physician, yet I have been—

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, as I understand the Senator, he first complains that a full report of the first day's proceedings was not presented to the Senate. That is true, because there was no reporter to the Senate. That is true, because there was no reporter present to take down the proceedings on that day.

Mr. LANE. Then, I ask why was part of it put in?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Second, the purpose of putting in the stenographer's report of the second day's hearing as a part of the report was to give the full testimony of Mr. William H. Green, upon whom the Senator relied for the information which was to be furnished in this investigation.

The Senator complains that nothing appears in the record regarding his protest that the hearing was held behind closed doors. It is true that when the Senator entered the room on the first day's hearing he did protest against locked doors, and later on, on the second day, when the hearing was being reported, he referred to his protest on that line, complaining of the fact that when he had entered the room on the preceding day the doors were closed.

If both Senators yield to me for a moment, I Mr. MYERS want to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Nevada has overlooked another very grave charge, which is that the Committee on Interstate Commerce has two committee rooms, one in the Senate Office Building and one in this building, for the convenience of the members; and also another very grave charge that the name on the Senator's office door appears in very small letters. I merely wanted the Senator from Nevada not to overlook those two grave charges.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I simply want to call attention to the fact that the stenographic report of the hearing on the second day does record the Senator's protest. The Senator said, as appears on page 14 of the report:

Senator Lane. That is all right. I told you, if I remember aright—and I would like to get that into the record, as I see a record is being taken—I had no doubt at all about it. I told you very frankly that I worked as hard as I could to keep this out of the hands of the committee; that I wanted it to go straight over the line where I started to put it, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that I did not like these investigations going on behind locked doors, which I found to be the case here on that date, and that irritated me somewhat.

The Charman. I will state that I inquired as to how the doors were locked, and I was told by my clerk that the guides in the Capitol are in the habit of bringing sight-seers, and that fearing that it would interrupt the proceedings of the committee, without any direction me, he did lock the door. But you will also recall that as soon as my attention was called to it, I ordered the doors to be unlocked and the meeting to be an open one.

I may say, Mr. President, that, of course, every Senator of experience in this body realizes of how little consequence this talk about locked doors is. There is not a committee in this body that does not have its open sessions and its executive sessions, and it is certainly no impropriety whatever to have an executive session. An executive session is, of course, held behind closed or locked doors. All I can say is that I wished to humor the Senator in matters of contention, and as soon as he called attention to the matter I ordered that the doors be opened. Of course, it is not a matter of much consequence.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I do not know just where I was when I left off. I believe I was saying that in the courts of law, in trials, I have noticed that where an attorney upon one side asks a question that is what they call a leading question, a suggestive question, one which suggests an answer, or something of that sort, there is almost always a protest from the opposing attorney; and quite frequently I have seen the judge declare the question out of order, and relieve the witness from making answer to it.

There was a certain question asked by the chairman of the witness-who, as I said before, was very much embarrassed and overawed at finding himself in the company of so many distinguished men-that suggested to him an answer. It was not strictly a question, but an assertion incorporated in a query. Mr. Green, the witness, had been opposing an investigation at that time, for the reason that he claimed he wanted an open one before the jury of the people; and the chairman suggested to him: "Now, Mr. Green, you see that you have had an open hearing here; an open public hearing, with the doors unlocked."

of the committee, the witness, and myself. There were no other persons present. It was not an open public hearing, for the reason that there was no public there. It might have been that they could have found their way in there. I did not receive notice that the hearing was to be held at the time it was until I had a telephone message from the committee or the clerk. It seems that a letter had been mailed to me the day before, but it did not reach me until that morning, too late for me to open. So if the witness had answered, "Oh, yes," he would have immediately conceded away his case. He would have had his foot right in a position where he could not have extricated it, and he would have been in the lamentable position of having protested against the thing which he finally conceded had been granted. He would have conceded his case away.

I saw that point. It was not what I called an open hearing; and I suggested to the witness and to the committee, "Oh, yes," that this was a very large and public hearing, and if the witness would look around him he would see large numbers of the public seated all about the room. That was a sarcastic remark. If that had been taken down, I presume it would have been considered a concession on my part. I should have labeled it as being sarcastic.

I did not consider that a fair proceeding. If all the evidence was to go into the report, if all the things which the witness and the committee said are to go in, why not print all that occurred? So I say I made remarks which were unparliamentary, and which I withdrew; for that reason I did not consider it a fair presentation, nor do I now. I do not want to say that it was done advisedly and unjustly. It might have been that some clerk edited the report. It might have been that the words were omitted in the stenographic report; but at any rate the remark did not appear, and I thought it should appear.

I will give way now to the Senator from Nevada, if he cares to have me do so. I will ask the Senator if he does not remember that query of his to the witness at that time?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I was not paying attention to the Senator at the time. To what does he refer?
Mr. LANE. It will not be found in the report. What I refer to is the suggestion which the Senator from Nevada made to the witness, accompanied by the query, "You see and will agree, Mr. Green, that you are having a public hearing here. The doors are unlocked, and you are having a public hearing." Does the Senator remember making that suggestive leading question to the witness?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not recall it. The record will show it if it was said.

Mr. LANE. It will?

Mr. NEWLANDS. This record contains all of Mr. Green's testimony.

Mr. LANE. And if it does not appear in this record, then it did not happen? Is that what I am to understand?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. I will read the part to which the Senator refers.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On page 32:

Senator Oliver. I should like to ask Mr. Green a question. Mr. Green, you, of course, have explained that you can not give us the names of the witnesses at present. Is there any particular reason why you should not give this committee a fair statement of the facts, without naming any person or without bringing anybody else into the controversy, as to what actually has been done? You say that rebates have been granted. That is merely general. Can you give us any specifications without giving names?

Mr. Green. No, sir; I can not, unless the inhibition is put on that it is a public hearing.

Senator Oliver. You want to talk to the newspapers and the public instead of the legislative tribunals that are set up for the purpose of investigating such things as that? Is that your position?

Mr. Green. I do not know—

The Chairman. You will understand, Mr. Green, that this session is not executive. Anybody can come in here, and whatever is reported here will be given to the press if they desire it, so that you are now having the benefit of a public hearing, so far as that is concerned.

Senator Townsend. Every word of it can be published by the newspapers. It can be printed.

Mr. Green. Anything I give I want to give it under oath, where I will have the protection. I will give you some of this evidence when I am put under oath.

Senator Townsend. What protection that you would get under oath did you have in mind, Mr. Green?

Senator Inne. He means that he would not be a voluntary witness, I presume; that he would not be compelled to testify.

Senator Oliver. He says he is not a witness at all; that he does not know anything.

Senator Townsend. You would not state anything under oath that know anything.

Schafor Townsend. You would not state anything under oath that you would not state to this committee? One would be just as truthful as the other?

Mr. Green. Yes, sir; it would be just as truthful, but it would not be

I suppose that is what the Senator refers to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, it pains me to say that it is not.

That is not what I refer to. It was about the last question which was asked, some time after that. It was not really a question; it was a suggestion, accompanied by a question: "Now, Mr. Green, you see that you have had a full, public, and open hearing, do you not?" or words to that effect. I can not quote them exactly, but that was the meaning of it.

I made reply to that, and I do not think you will find my reply there. If you do, I have entirely overlooked it. I think the chairman of the committee must remember that. Other members of the committee must remember it. I should like to have any Senator who was present at the time to say whether it happened or not.

I have not the stenographic notes, nor could I read them if I had. That was, in part, what I complained of; for, in my opinion, it was the very crux of the situation. I believe the people of this country will not at any time secure their rights, nor be properly represented, until their business is carried on out in the open. That may sound very foolish to many who think this method of going behind locked doors and carrying on their business is a matter of minor moment, but it strikes me differently. I think if the public business is carried on through committees and reports are to be made they should be full and complete, and let the facts lie as they fall, without prejudice to anyone, without malice.

I objected to that, and I object now, and I protest the record to that extent. How much else it lacks I can not say. I can not check it back. I have not had access to a translation of the stenographic notes. Whether there are other omissions or not I do not know. I do know of those, however, and I detected them on casual reading, and I called attention to them.

There are other matters in connection with the report to which I shall call attention later. I should like to have the Senator from Nevada say now whether he did ask that question or whether he did not, and whether it was not exactly as I

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not quite understand the Senator. The Senator asks me

Mr. LANE. Whether the Senator from Nevada did not make

Mr. NEWLANDS. What statement?

Mr. LANE. A statement to the witness asking him to bear witness to the fact that he had had a full, free, open, and public hearing that day before the committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no recollection of making such a statement in those words.

Mr. LANE. Well, perhaps, not quite; but as a matter of fact was not that said by him in closing, aside from the other statement which has been read?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have read the part of the record in which I state to the witness that the meeting is being held with open doors, and any one can attend. I have already read that. I have no recollection of making any other statement on that score.

Mr. LANE. I remember it distinctly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If I did, it will appear in the report of the meeting.

Mr. LANE. Then I will say, without reflecting at all upon anything or anyone except the Senator's memory—and that is all right, for I have a bad memory myself—that I remember it distinctly. I will say, further, that it does not appear in the report. Now, that is my best belief, and that is without any discourtesy being intended to the Senator.

In explanation to the Senator, I wish to say that that was the reason, or one of the reasons, that prompted me in calling this report what I did the other day, which remark I withdrew.

I understand that the Senator's memory does not recall this to his mind. Later along, before this report was printed or submitted, I will ask the Senator if he remembers coming to me and stating that if I would accept the committee's amendment this testimony would not be published?

I have no recollection of making any such Mr. NEWLANDS.

statement, Mr. President. Mr. LANE. All right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That this testimony would not be published?

Mr. LANE. Yes; that this testimony would not be published; that it would not be necessary to publish this report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I made no such statement, Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I made no such statement, if the Senator implies that I wished in any way to prevent the publication of this report. The fact was that I did wish the Senator to accept without discussion the amendment offered by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce just as a matter of protection to the Senator himself. I thought he would be a little bit sensitive about being made the instrumentality of a lot of unscrupulous men in presenting a matter to the United States Senate, and out of regard to him I suggested to him that the easiest way of disposing of the matter would be to accept the disposition suggested by the committee, which would refer the entire matter to the Attorney General and the Interstate Commerce Commission, one being charged with the duty of bringing a suit, if the facts were presented to him, and the other being charged with the duty of making an investigation under oath. Whatever suggestion I made upon that line was with a view to protecting the sensibilities of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I have not charged any unworthy motive to the Senator. As he says, it may have been all intended in kindness to me, and it may have been a hint. It is said that "a word to the wise is sufficient"; but, as I say, I did not quite understand why it would be better for me not to have this testimony published and accept the amendment. I wish to call attention to that, which did not strike me as just right, and I have made mention of it; it occurred. I wish to assert that it actually did occur, and I know an occurrence when I see it.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator Mr. from Montana to yield to me for a moment? Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the consent of the Senate that a vote may be taken on this matter at quarter past 1

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Nevada, and perhaps of the Chair. The Senator from Nevada speaks of the committee amendment. As I understand the parliamentary situation, there is no committee amendment, at least properly speaking. I do not know that I have any objection to considering it as an amendment; but the committee has not suggested any amendment to the resolution. It has simply reported a resolution itself, asking that the resolution proposed by the Senator from Oregon be referred to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But that is in the shape of an amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon. The amendment consists in the insertion of these words at the very commencement of the resolution:

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 241, reading as follows: Then comes the further amendatory part, at the close be referred to the Atterney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation and for such action as shall be deemed advisable by them, or either of them, in the public interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that that does not constitute an amendment. The committee has said: "Resolved, That Senate resolution No. so-and-so," which they set out, "be referred so-and-so." That is simply a recommendation of the committee. It is not a part of the resolution. If we vote on that and make it a part of the resolution, it seems to me it is taking a step in the way of amending a resolution that we can not properly take as a parliamentary body.

I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that nowhere does the so-called amendment suggest any change in the resolution. It neither strikes out anything nor adds anything to it. It is simply a resolution of the committee that such a resolution be referred to some other body. An amendment, it seems to me, would have either to strike out or to add to it, or both.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I think the whole matter is entirely clear. The report says:

The committee therefore reports the resolution back with certain amendments, so that when amended it will read as follows:

Then these amendments appear in the amended resolution in italics, and they constitute the amendments which were made by the committee. It seems to me the matter is entirely clear. I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on this matter at quarter past 1

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will ask the Senator if that can be done under the rule which was recently adopted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There will have to be a roll call if a request for unanimous consent is to be made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well; I withdraw the request. Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have the honor of being an humble member of the Interstate Commerce Committee of this body, and I simply wish to present to the Senate some views of this question, which are different, I believe, from any others that have been presented.

I doubt if Members of the Senate and the people of the country appreciate the gravity and tremendous importance of the issue now before the Senate. When I came here three years ago I was thoroughly imbued with the fact that the country was all to the bad; that the plutocratic holders of predatory wealth were in the saddle; that the Aldriches and Paynes were running the Government; and that the very lifeblood of the people was being crushed out. But never in my wildest days did I dream that such a horrible state of affairs existed as that the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate should have two committee rooms, one in the Senate Office Building and the other here in the Capitol, so that when the members of the committee want to hold extemporaneous meetings while the Senate is in session they can be close at hand.

I doubt if the country realizes the horrible import of that state of affairs. Think of it for a minute. Suppose that grand patriot and sturdy defender of the rights of the people, that eminent citizen of the country, Mr. David Lamar, wanted to go to the committee room to lay bare before the committee some terrific onslaught on the rights of the people of this country, he would not know to which room to go; he might go to one committee room and the committee might be in the other, and he might go to the other committee room and the committee might be meeting in its room in the Capitel, so that it might be a sort of hide-and-seek, hocus-pocus arrangement.

Another horrible thing of which I was not aware when I came here was that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Newlands] had his name in small type on the door of his office in the Senate Office Building, and that as you enter the room of the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the Senate Office Building you have to enter a door that leads through an antercom. Horrible thought! How many innocent men have to their grave danger sought the committee room through the avenue of this anteroom. How many innocent men have been foully murdered as they sought the committee room through the avenue of this antercom. Whenever I enter it I find a mild-mannered gentleman sitting at his desk ready to show me anywhere I want to go or to give me any information. I believe he is the secretary of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Newlands]. I never imagined that he was such a bloodthirsty individual as to imperil the lives or liberty of anybody who might enter the room where he was sitting However, once getting into the committee, we learn that those gentlemen who are known to the country as enemies of our Government, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Pomerene], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and others sit in a dark corner of the room, and what they do there, I suppose, is beyond the wildest flight of imagination of the most apprehensive opponents of the rule of predatory wealth. These are things which I think ought to be forcibly impressed on the people of this country and given all the publicity possible.

Speaking seriously, I will say that when this matter came up before the committee, after hearing the statements of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane] and Mr. W. H. Green, who was brought before the committee, I was in favor of reporting back favorably the resolution that had been introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE]. It occurred to me that it would be all right to do it; but as practically all the other members of the committee seemed to think that it would be beyond our power to direct or command the Interstate Commerce Commission to do anything in the line of the discharge of its duties, in as much as we exercise the functions of a separate branch of the Government, and as I believed that contention was sound, I agreed to the amendment to the resolution which has been reported here. I believe it accomplishes every purpose the original resolution would have accomplished. It provides that the original resolution shall be referred for investigation not only to the Interstate Commerce Commission but to the Department of Justice. That is the exact language—that it be "referred for investigation." That is an implied direction or request that it be investigated not only by one, but by both of those bodies; and it seems to me that accomplishes everything that was intended to be or could be accomplished by the original resolution. I believe it is all sufficient to cover the necessities of the case. While I disagreed in committee with some of my associates in regard to it, I am now heartily in accord with them in wanting this body to adopt the amendment suggested by the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, on Friday it was agreed that on to-day the Senate would consider the Glass case. morning I had a conference with members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and other Senators, and it has been decided that the case shall be called up to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask what the pending question is on which we are to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norms] made a parliamentary inquiry as to the state of the It is somewhat doubtful whether this is or is not an amendment of the resolution, but the Chair does not think that it is very important whether it be treated simply as a question on concurring in the report of the committee or whether it be considered as an amendment to the resolution, because either accomplishes the same purpose. The sole point is whether the resolution of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane] shall be referred to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Com-merce Commission for such action as may be deemed advisable by them, or by either of them, in the public interest.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, a parliamentary aquiry. There seem to be two propositions presented—one the resolution of the Senator from Oregon and the other the resolution as modified or the disposition of it as recommended by the committee. Perhaps some of us would like to vote separately on those propositions. For instance, an affirmative vote for the amendment would put the matter squarely before the Senate on the report of the committee, and some might not be in favor of the resolution as amended but would be in favor of

The VICE PRESIDENT. Subject to appeal from the decision of the Chair, the Chair is going to treat it as an amendment to the resolution and put the question as an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is right.
The VICE PRESIDENT. That gives an opportunity for two votes on the question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is what I meant.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment, because I believe this complaint should have been investigated and that we should ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate it. I care nothing about the character of the man who brings it, and there is nothing against the character of Mr. Green, so far as I have heard; but if he be a man of intelligence and having some standing in his State, as I understand he has, and if he has knowledge that makes him think the Steel Corporation has been receiving rebates in violation of the law and it is brought to the attention of the Senate, I think we should ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to make the investigation or make it ourselves, because the Steel Corporation is a powerful industrial corporation that monopolizes very largely and controls one of the great industries of America.

The complaint that we have no authority to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to make such an investigation I think has no weight, because we have made such requests time and again, and they have been complied with. We had an investigation of the Frisco Railroad filed with us just a short time since. That was made upon a request from this body; and other investigations have been made by the Interstate Commerce Commission at our request.

I have not evidence to substantiate the charge, but I believe, from what I have heard, the Steel Corporation has had rebates, and I think we ought to know about it. I do not think that it could have developed its great business unless it received favors from great transportation companies that its competitors did not get. Rebates and the control of transportation lines have had more to do with the development of the great industrial trusts in this country than anything else.

I do not intend to vote to sidetrack or in any way weaken any request that might go from the Senate to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an investigation of this concern; so I shall oppose this amendment which, I think, sidetracks the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to make a further inquiry, Mr. President. If this is regarded as an amendment, after it is voted on as a committee amendment the entire resolution will still be before the Seuate for further amendment or to offer a substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection then to the course sug-

I vote "yea."

So the amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there was some confusion at the time and I did not hear the announcement of the vote on the amendment to the resolution. Was the amendment agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was agreed to.
Mr. NORRIS. Then, I offer the substitute, which I send to the desk, for the amended resolution now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska proposes an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to conduct an examination and inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether the United States Steel Corporation or any of its subsidiaries have been guilty of giving or receiving any unlawful rebates, offsets, or preferences, especially within the last six years; and if said commission finds that such unlawful rebates, offsets, or preferences have been given or received, then the commission is directed to report the dates and amounts thereof to the Senate for its information.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that this substitute eliminates some of the objections, at least the technical objections, made by many of those who have opposed the original resolution. Of course, as the resolution has been amended it simply refers the matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the Attorney General. It has seemed to me all the way through that the Senate ought to take definite action in regard to the matter and either order an investigation or not do so. There were those who objected to the original resolu-tion on account of some of the propositions contained in it, on technical grounds that had more or less merit; that, for instance, it was asking something to be done that we have no constitutional right to ask should be done. It seems to me that those objections, at least, will all be eliminated if we pass the substitute ordering the investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not care to debate it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President-The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator. Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely want to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that I think there would be no doubt about the correctness of his position if he would make this a concurrent or a joint resolution. Preferably it ought to be a joint resolution, so as to have the force of law, and there then could be no doubt at all about it. I think that would be a very happy solution of the whole problem.

Mr. NORRIS. The resolution I have offered—

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, the Senator's resolution is merely a Senate resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I very seriously doubt the right of the Senate alone or of the other House alone to direct or instruct the Interstate Commerce Commission; in fact, I doubt it so seriously that I have not any doubt about it at all. I do not think either House has any such power or any such right. It is very easy to make this a joint resolution, and I hope the Senator from Nebraska will do so. I have no doubt that it would then pass both Houses of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that his objection, it seems to me, is met. It was argued, for instance, the other day, I think, by the Senator—

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a mere suggestion. I do not care to debate it.

Mr. NORRIS. That the Senate had no right whatever to order an investigation unless, for the purpose of the Senate, such investigation was necessary. The substitute which I have offered directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to report to the Senate the amounts of the relates and the dates the rebates were received, if it were found that there were rebates. So it comes clearly within the power of the Senate, for the purposes of the uses of the Senate, to order this investigation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that,

Mr. NORRIS. That is the usual course. We have been fol-

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, if the Senator will pardon me, the Senator from Nebraska, by the mere technical annexing of dates and report making seeks to obtain a jurisdiction for the Senate to direct the course of a public utilities commission. Technically, possibly that may give us jurisdiction, but I doubt it; in fact, I do not believe it does so, but I would rather we should go at this in a straightforward way. I would rather Congress should direct the commission to make this investigation, not for the information of Congress, but for the information of the country and the punishment of the culprits, if there are any culprits.

Mr. NORRIS. The theory, Mr. President, at least is that the Senate needs this information for the purpose of properly legislating. I have no objection to changing the word "direct" to "request," if that will suit the Senator from Mississippi, because the Interstate Commerce Commission, if we direct them to do this or if we request them to do this, are going to do it, as they have said before the committee in this case, as I understand, and as they have always done when similar resolutions have been passed by the Senate. It seems to me that enough has developed here to show that we ought to have an investigation and that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the proper body in which it should take place.

The other objections that have been urged against the original resolution of a technical nature I think are all met by this I hope the chairman of the committee will offer no opposition to the substitute and let us pass it. It will settle the matter. If the resolution shall be passed in its original form, we shall have simply shifted the responsibility to another body as to whether or not there shall be an investigation of a matter which we ought ourselves to decide.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think there can be no doubt of the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WIL-LIAMS], that one House of Congress has no right to impose duties on a board whose duties are fixed by law; but it is impossible, Mr. President, here and now to change a Senate resolution into a joint resolution. A joint resolution must be introduced and have its two readings. A Senate resolution never has such readings and never has what is required for a bill or a joint resolution. Of course, a joint resolution can be introduced and take the regular course; but we can not make a joint resolution by simply changing the title of a resolution pending before the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he amends his substitute by inserting the word "requested" for the word "directed"?

Mr. NORRIS. I should be willing to do that if that would be agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator do that?

Mr. NORRIS. I have offered to do that if the Senators who are opposed to it in its present form would so prefer. If, with that change, it will meet with the approval of the chairman of the committee, I shall be glad to make the change. I do not, how-ever, care to make that change if those who are asking it are going to vote against the resolution anyway.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, I should like to know in what form the Senator presents the resolution, so that I can address my discussion to that form.

Mr. NORRIS. I have offered it as a substitute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator offers it as a direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission, then it is clear that the Senate is usurping the law-making functions of Congress. The Senate has no right, by a separate resolution, to direct the action of a tribunal that has been created by the action of Congress, approved by the President. The Senate has, however, a right to make a request of the Interstate Commerce Com-

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to comply with the Senator's desire, modify the resolution by changing the word "directed" to the word "requested."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. President, that simplifies the matter very much. We now have a request to the Interstate Commerce Commission to inquire into this question of rebates received by the United States Steel Co. and to report to Congress. I regard the resolution which has been reported by the means nothing. Congress can not act after receiving the report, except in the shape of legislation; it can do nothing whatever in the way of the enforcement of the law, because that belongs to the executive department. The resolution reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee refers the whole subject matter both to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation and action.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do. Mr. VARDAMAN. I would suggest to the Senator from Nevada, so as to meet the desires of the Senator from Nebraska, that if the committee amendment to this resolution should be amended by providing that the matter be referred to the Attorney General and the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation, and that the commission should report its findings of facts to the Congress, then the Congress can take such action as it may see fit with reference to directing the commission. That would meet the desire of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but i' would be simply delaying the

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may rise to a question of order, I do not think we can amend an amendment that has been adopted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What is that?

Mr. LODGE. I think we can not amend an amendment that has just been adopted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that can not be done, Mr.

President, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the disposition made by the committee is the best disposition, because it is the more direct; it refers the whole subject matter to the Attorney General's office-the Department of Justice-and to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the only organizations which are charged with responsibility in such cases, under the law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do. Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the resolution which the Senator from Nevada has reported as chairman of the committee reads:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to conduct an examination—

Do I understand now that the Senator believes that we can not direct them to conduct the examination?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will allow me, I think the Senator from Idaho is mistaken about that

Mr. NEWLANDS. To what resolution does the Senator from Idaho refer

Mr. BORAH. The resolution reported by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will allow me, I think there is confusion as to the matter, but the fact is, if the Senator will read the amendment reported by the committee

Mr. BORAH. I am reading the resolution-

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But that is not the thing to read, because the amendment reported by the committee recommends "That Senate resolution No. 241, reading as follows," and so forth, be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BORAH. The resolution, which is to be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to conduct an examination—

The resolution which we are referring to them has that in it, has it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Then, what are we doing? Are we directing them to make this examination, or are we not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We are not.

Mr. BORAH. Then what is the need of passing the resolution at all?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is a matter upon which the Senator can exercise his own judgment. I insist that the action of the committee is the proper action; that Congress has already created a commission, with powers of investigation regarding rebates. It is the duty of that commission, whenever it finds that rebates have been received, to call the attention of the Department of Justice to the matter; and it is made the duty of the Attorney General to institute a suit for three times the amount of the rebates received. Are we to take the methods of committee as more desirable than that. A report to Congress | circumlocution in this matter and refer it to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission with instructions to report back to us, or are we to refer it to them for investigation and such action as they deem advisable under the discretion imposed upon them by the law in the interest of public justice? The resolution offered, as amended, meets the entire situation and offers a speedy solution of this entire difficulty. As soon as the resolution is passed the Interstate Commerce Commission will make the investigation, and if the facts alleged are disclosed they will be brought to the attention of the Attorney General, and doubtless he will act upon them, and, even without going to the Interstate Commerce Commission, if probable cause is shown to the Attorney General, he will doubtless institute suit.

The purpose of this resolution as originally introduced was to secure the institution of suits. Let us therefore refer the whole matter to the tribunals charged with the administration of the law and not require further reports to Congress

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator will admit that we do not even request the Interstate Commerce Commission to do this under his resolution. You put in the word "direct," but you rob it of all effect by simply referring it without passing the resolution itself. Therefore you neither direct nor request the Interstate Commerce Commission to do this thing.

The Senator from Nebraska has offered a resolution in which the Senate goes on record as desiring it to be done and requesting the commission to do it. That expresses the view and the conviction of the Senate that it ought to be done. In the other form the Senate expresses no view whatever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris].

Mr. L'ORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL COMMISSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 107) relating to supervision of the Lincoln Memorial, to report it favorably without amendment. I call the attention to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. James] to the joint resolution.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection.

Mr. ROOT. May the joint resolution be read?
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint. resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the exercise of its control and direction for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial, authorized by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911, the commission created by said act shall designate, to perform the duty of special resident commissioner to represent the commission in the oversight of the work, the Hon. Joseph C. S. Blackburn, recently appointed a member of the Lincoln Memorial Commission, as the successor to the Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, deceased, and for the special service of the member so designated, he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum out of the appropriations for the construction of such memorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present

consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ROOT. I do not wish to antagonize the joint resolution, but I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky whether it would not be useful to have it dispose of some questions of authority which have arisen regarding the performance of the duties of the commission,

Mr. JAMES. I will state to the Senator from New York that the joint resolution is in the exact language of the joint resolution passed through this body creating the position of resident commissioner and naming Hon, Shelby M. Cullom for the performance of the duties.

Mr. ROOT. I know; I drafted that joint resolution and introduced it, and I supposed its terms were not open to any doubt, but doubt seems to have arisen, something amounting to almost a conflict of authority between the commission and the Secretary of War. If we are going to pass the joint resolution now, I think it would be a good thing to put something in—a few words might do it—which would prevent further difference

Mr. JAMES. Of course, I would prefer that this joint resolution should be considered to-day, because the commission is going to meet in a day or so, and ex-Senator Blackburn has been appointed by the President and he would be able to act with them. I sincerely hope the Senator from New York will not delay the passage of this resolution. If legislation is necessary to settle questions of authority between the commission and the Secretary of War, that can be done in a separate bill, which would not delay this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Several Senators were prevented from introducing bills, and I would be glad to yield to them,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. The VICE PRESIDENT. Wi

Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The question is on the request of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. James]. Is there any objection to the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 107?

Mr. JAMES. I have consulted with the Senator from New York, and he has no objection.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to give notice that on the disposition of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections upon the credentials of Mr. Glass, of Alabama, I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

SIXTH INTERNATIONAL DAIRY CONGRESS (S. DOC. NO. 400).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

In view of the provision of law contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that—

Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event, without first having specific authority of law to do so—

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress and for its determination, whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of Switzerland to that of the United States to send delegates to the Sixth International Dairy Congress, to be held at Berne from the 8th to the 10th of June, 1914, and a letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture showing the favor with which the Department of Agriculture views the proposed gathering.

It will be observed that the acceptance of the invitation will involve no special appropriation of money by the Government.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12235. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COOPERATIVE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of House bill 7951, which is the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

the United States Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Robinson in the chair).

The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to resume the argument upon this amendment. I concluded that on Saturday. During the course of my address the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Smith] challenged some of the statements that I made with regard to the agricultural production of Georgia and Iowa. I said in reply that the figures which I gave had been prepared by a former employee—possibly he then was an employee—of the Census Bureau, and that I had not examined the details, but I would do so. Since that time I have investigated the matter, and I have before me now the original sources of information. I have the details from which the statement I presented to the Senate on Saturday was made up.

I find that the statement I made was accurate, and I do not desire to change it in any way. There needs, however, to be made, I think, an explanation in one respect. The agricultural product of live stock is not an annual product, and the statistics that I furnished the Senate include all the live stock both in Iowa and in Georgia. For instance, in Iowa there were, in 1909, domestic animals of the value of $398,131,193. Those animals were not all produced in one year, of course. There were in Georgia in the same year domestic animals of the value of $87,280,340. It is likewise true that these were not all produced in one year. The method of computation pursued by the statistician who prepared the statement that I gave to the Senate is exactly the same in Iowa and in Georgia, and proportionately, therefore, the result is the same. There is no difference in the outcome.

I have the pleasure of sending to the desk of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] these tables; which will enable him to see at a glance precisely the method employed by the person who computed the matter in reaching the result which I stated to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will allow me just a moment. I find no error, but I thought it was due to say that the live stock, not being an annual product, the value of it is found in both States in the same way. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. When the Senator was addressing the Senate on Saturday, he quoted some statistics giving the population and acreage in cultivation and the votes cast in several of the different States of the Union. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the statistics that he furnished include the State of Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. The statements to which I referred many times in the course of my address do include information with regard to the State of Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. Will the Senator be good enough to give it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to give it.

According to the census report Idaho had a population of 325,594. The rural population of that State is 255,696. The percentage of the rural population of Idaho compared with the total rural population of the United States is fifty-two one-hundredths of I per cent, and that is the percentage of the appropriation provided in the bill to which Idaho would be entitled.

I find further that Idaho had a total land area, according to this report, of 53,346,560 acres. Of this the land in farms amounted to 5,283,604 acres, and the improved land in farms, which is the basis I present in the amendment offered, amounts to 2,778,740 acres. That is fifty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent of all the improved land in farms in the United States, so that Idaho would receive under the amendment I have offered fifty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the appropriation, whereas under the bill as it is Idaho will receive fifty-two one-hundredths of 1 per cent. The amendment which I have offered increases the allotment to Idaho six one-hundredths of 1 per

Mr. BRADY. At the same time, if I remember correctly, the Senator gave a comparative statement of the votes cast in Georgia, Iowa, and other States. Has the Senator the number of votes cast in Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unfortunately I have not. I have only the votes cast in 24 States, 12 in the North and 12 in the South, which I compared, and the list does not include Idaho. So I have not before me the statistics upon that matter.

Mr. BRADY. The vote cast in Idaho at the last general election was something over 108,000. I should like to have the Senator show that in his figures.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to include that, if the Senator from Idaho will wait a moment. Take Georgia. The vote cast was 121,524. How many votes were cast in Idaho?

Something over 108,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. There were pretty nearly as many in Idaho as in Georgia, but Georgia receives of this appropriation 4.19 per cent and Idaho received fifty-two one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. I would suggest to the Senator that it might be a good idea to have this fund distributed on the votes cast instead of the acreage or the population. The voters are the people who take an interest in the affairs of the State and the

Mr. CUMMINS. While that would work very well, of course, for some States, I am not prepared to say that it would be in and of itself a fair standard. I think it is one of the things that ought to be considered, and if it were thought best by those who are in charge of the bill to compound a standard out of the votes cast, the rural population, and the acreage of improved farms, we would through that composite standard reach a more perfect quota certainly than we will reach in accepting the basis of the bill.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I fully realize that it is going to be a very hard matter indeed to have this appropriation distributed entirely equitably. At the same time I feel that there is so much merit in the bill and there is such grave need of its passage at this time that I believe it would be well for us to give careful consideration to the division as suggested by the bill as it stands.

I happen to be a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I know that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH! has worked very earnestly and faithfully to have the bill perfected in the most beneficial manner. If we can get the bill enacted into law at this time, later on we can mutually agree upon some plan of distribution of the appropriation, if this distribution is found to be inequitable, that will be fair to each and every State.

I believe that the work we have to do at this time is more in the nature of getting a bill that will extend the benefit of this appropriation to the farmers of the country than we are in providing for an exact and, you might say, equitable dis-tribution of an appropriation of this kind, for I am convinced that the Department of Agriculture will recommend and that Congress will pass any remedial legislation that may be necessary in order that the rural and farming population of every State shall receive its just share of the funds appropriated in case it is found that the method of distribution provided in this bill does not do justice to the agricultural States taking advantage of this act.

The farming community is one that we must give some attention to. It is one that has been more or less neglected, and the manner of handling this fund has been worked out, in my judgment, on the best plans and lines that it is possible to do at this time.

On Saturday during the very able address of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] he made the statement that these meetings of the farmers, where they were to be instructed by these demonstrators, would be on the larger and better farms. have been carrying on this work in a small way in our State for some years, and we have found that the best way to have a demonstration made is with the farmer whose farm is not in as good condition as that of his neighbor who has been able to give his farm proper attention. The best success we have had in this work has been by taking a farm that has been neglected and run down and have the demonstrator go upon that particular farm and demonstrate to that farmer and his neighbors what can be done by taking a poor or a neglected farm and improving it and placing it in a high state of cultivation. It has been demonstrated on many occasions that the output from a farm of this character can be doubled and sometimes quadrupled by proper seeding, proper cultivation, and a proper planting of the crops.

This appropriation that we are making is comparatively very small indeed when we consider the great advantage it will be to the rural population and farmers of our country. I am advised that the Corn Exchange of Chicago gives to the farmers of this country $1,000,000 a year for this class of work. They do that as a simple business proposition, for they believe that it will enable them to have the farmers market a sufficient crop to justify an investment of $1,000,000 each year by one concern in one city. If they can afford to do that as a simple business proposition it seems to me that we can afford as a Nation to extend a helping hand to the farmer by the passage of this bill.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will give this bill that fair and equitable consideration to which it is entitled, and let us see that it is passed at the earliest possible moment.

Now, with reference to the distribution of the appropriation according to acres and the population, this matter was presented to the committee by men who were earnestly trying to decide how this appropriation should be distributed; and, as the Senator from Georgia said on Saturday in his remarks, it was decided to distribute it according to rural population upon the advice of the representatives of the different agricultural colleges of the country and not upon the suggestion of any State or any particular individual.

We have in many of the States very large farms, farms running as high as from 5,000 to 10,000 acres, owned by one man; we have in other States small farms, consisting of from 1 to 5 or 10 acres. The man who is on the small farm is entitled to just as much educational advantage as is the man who is on the larger farm. It seems to me that it is human beings, and not broad acres, that we are trying to educate; we are trying to improve the man; so that the man, by his superior knowledge, may improve the farm, thus bringing added wealth to our country. I sincerely hope that we may agree on this bill and enact it into law at the earliest possible moment.

The work being done by the Agricultural Department and the agricultural colleges of the various States in demonstrating on the ground in a practical way to the farmer the advantages of scientific methods applied to agriculture is so beneficial and farreaching in effect that there can be no question as to the advisability and necessity of extending assistance in this way to the men who produce the major part of the material wealth of this Nation. We have recently enacted legislation for the benefit of the manufacturer in the tariff law; we have recently enacted legislation for the benefit of the banker in the currency act, and it is only just that we shall enact some legislation for the benefit of the farmer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield. Mr. VARDAMAN. I rise for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as I stated on Saturday afternoon, the plan for the distribution of this fund was presented to Representative Leven and myself by Dr. Thompson, of Ohio; Dean Russell, of Wisconsin; Dean Butterfield, of Massachusetts; Dean Jordan, of New York; Dean Curtis, of Iowa; and Dr. True, Director of Experiment Stations. It was presented not with a view of accommodating the needs of any particular State or of turning the appropriation in the direction of any particular State. I do not think one of these men had worked out the problem as to just where the fund would go; I certainly did not know myself. It was based upon distribution according to rural population; it was to be a fund to be used in the rural sections to carry information and knowledge to the people of the rural sections. Therefore those able educators, the leaders, the committee representing the colleges of agriculture and the experiment stations suggested a plan of distribution that would carry the fund according to population, where they thought the fund should go and should be used.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. Brady] a few moments ago expressed admirably the purpose of the distribution and the plan of distribution. If we turn to the bill, we find that it is to diffuse "among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics," to diffuse information among the people relating to agriculture and home economics. It is to be administered by the colleges of agriculture. The work is to consist of "the giving of instruction and practical demonstrations in agriculture and home economics to persons not attending or resident in said colleges in the several communities, and imparting to such persons information on said subjects through field demonstrations, publications, and otherwise." It is to carry information to people engaged in agricultural work. These gentlemen considered that the best way to determine who were interested in agricultural work was to accept the classification of "rural population" as fixed by the Census Bureau and as followed by our Government in census enumerations for a number of years.

The amount of work, Mr. President—the number of people needed for the work—does not depend upon acreage. One State might have large farms cultivated by a few men through the use of machinery; another State might have small farms largely cultivated by individual persons, where machinery could not do the work. It is instruction to be given to the people. I believe it will reach in time not only to the grown man on the farm, but that will involve the direction of the children in the schools whose parents are on the farm. will also cover advice in marketing farm products. It will involve instruction requiring an amount of work dependent upon the people who are to receive the instruction. This was the view of the committee representing the colleges of agriculture and experiment stations. This was the view of officers of the Agricultural Department, and this was the reason why they made this selection.

But the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] presents another plan. He asks that the distribution be made upon the basis of improved farm lands. I may say that if he had examined the statistics upon this subject he would certainly have found that he had selected a plan that at least would be generous to That he had selected a plan that at least would be generous to Iowa, because in the percentage of improved lands Iowa stands ahead of any State in the Union. The percentage throughout the Union is 25; the percentage in Iowa is, I believe, 83; so that Iowa, using this plan of distribution, would be from 200 to 300 per cent better off that any other State in the Union in proportion to the lands of the respective States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Georgia does not mean that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should not have said "than any other State"; I should have said "than the average State." The average in the Union is 25 per cent, but in Iowa the average is 83 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course "the average" includes Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the improved lands of Iowa ex-I do not question that, and that is the reason why our lands can be put to better use.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator has selected a basis that puts Iowa ahead of every other State in the Union and gives her 83 per cent to 25 per cent for the average State. The average of improved lands as compared with all the lands in the United States is 25 per cent; the average of Iowa is 83 per cent; and the Senator from Iowa has selected a basis of distribution which, as between Iowa and the other States of the Union, gives her 83 and them 25 per cent,

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, the Senator Georgia must certainly see the injustice of comparing Iowa with the average State. Compare Iowa with the other agricultural States. My plan gives Illinois 5.86 per cent; it gives Indiana 3.54 per cent; it gives Iowa 6.16 per cent; it gives Kansas 6.25 per cent; and so on.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It gives a few States of the Central West around Iowa a substantial increase, but it reduces the percentage to over 30 States.

Mr. President, the Senator was again generous to Iowa in his estimate of Iowa's agricultural products, according to the last census. He gave those products at $789,000,000. The Senator was entirely inaccurate in that statement. He has told us this morning that he has found that the figures giving her production for that year as made up included all her live stock. Live stock that may have lived 15 years all came into that year's

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Georgia ought to remark, in that connection, that the figures were made up on exactly the same basis, so far as Georgia is concerned, as were those for every other State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Precisely, Mr. President; but Georgia is not a cattle-raising State; Georgia is not a stockraising State, and Iowa is. So that Iowa would get the benefit of $300,000,000 worth of stock and cattle, while Georgia would get less than $100,000,000, a little over $50,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Eighty-seven million dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The only fair way to make this estimate is to take your increase that year. Suppose we had kept our cotton for 10 years, that we had held it in Georgia, and that we had had a billion dollars worth of cotton on hand in 1910, would it have been fair, in determining our production for 1910, to say: "We have a billion dollars worth of cotton"?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to compare cotton with corn. In making up these tables the annual product of corn is given and the annual product of cotton, and they are treated exactly the same in the two States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But it is an unfair comparison to the States that are not cattle-raising States. If you propose to take live stock, which may require you 10 years to accumulate, and treat it as a product of a single year, the State that engages in raising live stock has an advantage in the statement over the State that does not. We might just as well accumulate our agricultural products for 10 years and put them against yours as for you to take live stock, which it may have required 10 years to raise, and treat your whole live stock as an annual production.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes,

Mr. GRONNA. With the permission of the Senator from Georgia, I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if he has the figures for North Dakota, which is purely an agricultural State and not a stock-raising State?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I have them.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield for that at this time. wish to proceed with the discussion of Iowa. Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The census shows a production in Iowa for 1909 of only $598,000,000, instead of $789,000,000. That $598,000,000 includes a full estimate for the sale of her beeves and her other live stock, and for the corn fed to them. So even that statement gives Iowa her corn twice over; it gives her her corn as raised and her corn again fed into her beeves and increased in value. Not alone is that true, but a careful study of the figures discloses the fact that a large part of the beeves were not raised in Iowa, but were brought into that magnificent farm-producing State-the best, I think, in the Union-and fed for a few months in Iowa before they were sold. So that be-fore we can find the real agricultural production of Iowa for 1909 we must deduct the corn and the oats and the hay fed to your beeves, fed to your stock, fed to your sheep, and fed to your poultry, and you must deduct what you paid for the beeves brought into Iowa before they were fattened.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President—

yield further to the Senator from Iowa? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose, then, that in order to ascertain the entire product of Georgia, if she had cotton mills within her borders, as she has, you would have to deduct from the product of the cotton mills the cotton that was grown in Georgia in order to find out what Georgia was really doing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I repudiate that way of ascertaining what a State really is producing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think any other would be utterly If we took our lint cotton first and settled what it was worth, then we took our yarns and added our yarn production, then took our gray goods and added that production, then took our bleached goods and added that production, and then took our dyed goods and added that production, we would be running our lint cotton through four different processes and have it recognized as a production of the State five different times. When it went into the yarn it would have its second count, when it went into the grays it would have its third, when it went into the bleached it would have its fourth, and when it went into the dyed goods it would have its fifth count, and it would be utterly unfair. I would admit that it was a case of padding if I did it for Georgia. What I want to find out is what has the State really produced. We have produced lint cotton; then we produced the increased value incident to the yarn, but we did not produce the cotton again when we made the yarn; we produced an increased value when we wove it, but we did not produce the yarn again; and so on.

So, Mr. President, the only fair way to determine what Iowa really produces is to take $598,000,000 and deduct all the corn and the hay and the oats fed to the stock, and deduct also about $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 paid for stock brought into Iowa and fattened there, and then we will find that this splendid State-for it ranks right at the head among our great States, certainly in agriculture—has made the magnificent contribution to our country of about $400,000,000, instead of $789,000,000.

Now, Mr. President, with regard to my own State, it is true that the Senator from Iowa treated Georgia as to cattle just as he treated Iowa. The trouble is that ours is not a cattle State; ours is not a stock State; and while he treated us the same way, he treated our cattle and stock production, which amounts relatively to scarcely anything, in a way that gave Georgia little increase, while he treated the production of cattle and stock of his State, which runs up into the $300,000,000, in a way it did not deserve, and Iowa would get a benefit on $300,000,000, while Georgia would get it on $50,000,000.

Mr. President, I would not utter a word that was not in praise of Iowa. I have sounded throughout my own State the praise of the splendid college of agriculture in Iowa; I have told the people of my State the story of how that college and Iowa's splendid agricultural leaders, under the leadership of the present Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins], improved the character of the seed and increased their corn products as a result of his leadership and their work; but I wish to say just a word about my own State. The figures of 1909 do not show anything comparable with the present product of Georgia. Those figures gave us in cotton one hundred and twenty-odd million dollars. Last year our cotton production and the seed from the cotton passed $200,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Iowa? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

The Senator is doing his own State an in-Mr. CUMMINS. justice. I think the amount produced in Georgia in 1909, including the cotton seed, is $149,000,000. That is my recol-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I am trying now to turn to exact figures.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will turn to the table which I furnished him, he will find them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have the figures here. The Senator says the value of the cotton grown in Georgia that year was $140,000,000, I believe. Is that the Senator's statement Mr. CUMMINS. My recollection is that it was $149,000,000.

I may be wrong about that; it may be $140,000,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of cotton?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Cotton in Georgia in 1909. I think the Senator from Iowa is mistaken.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator allow me to examine the table I gave him? It is the census table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. This table shows that the value was $149,-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then it includes cottonseed oil, too.

I have the original census report here.
Mr. CUMMINS. That is the census report; it is clipped from a census bulletin.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, the total of cotton, as laid down here in the census report, is $126,695,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the cotton seed, if you will add

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not see cotton seed given here at all. It gives the total of cotton as $126,695,000. total of cotton last year, leaving out the seed, went to $170,-000,000, an increase of nearly one-third. Our corn production went from 13 to 19 bushels per acre, and nearly doubled in the four years. The truth is that the whole system of farming is being revolutionized in the State, and I am glad to say that some of the good work that is being done is by white farmers coming down from the Middle West.

I wish to call attention to another fact connected with our two States. During the 10 years preceding the last census, Iowa fell off in rural population 120,000, while Georgia increased The number of farms in Iowa decreased 12,000, while the number of farms in Georgia increased 66,000. The total population of Iowa decreased 7,000, while that of Georgia increased 393,000.

All these facts might well be considered in connection with this problem of distribution if we were to consider anything except the one proposition that we have presented in this bill, namely, rural population; but the Senator from Iowa has presented a plan, and I wish to see how it works.

The Senator's plan is to make the distribution according to the improved farm lands. In improved farm lands Iowa has 83 per cent. The average in the United States is 25 per cent. Iowa, with a population of 2,225,000 people, would receive a larger proportion of this fund than New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey combined, with a total population of 19,300,000 people and a rural population of 5,600,000 against 1,545,000 in

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Georgia give the per-centages of each of the States he has just mentioned under the pending bill?

I can give them together. Mr. SMITH of Georgia.

Mr. CUMMINS. And will the Senator give them under his plan of distribution, also?

Mr SMITH of Georgia. Under the pending bill New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey would receive 11.34 per cent and Iowa 3.13 per cent. Under the improved-land amendment New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey would receive 6.13 per cent and Iowa 6.16 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is not a great deal of difference. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Still, it is more to Iowa; more to Iowa than to New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey; more to 2,225,000 inhabitants than to 19,300,000 inhabitants; more to

1.545,000 rural population than to 5,600,000 rural population. Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield to the Senator from Iowa? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. When the Senator from Georgia is making these comparisons, he ought not to overlook the fact that under the plan of the pending bill Georgia gets a great deal more than New York, a great deal more than Pennsylvania, and I am not sure whether or not it gets as much as New Jersey and Pennsylvania combined.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this, if correct, is not an answer to what I was telling the Senator about his figures. He is seeking to defend the shocking result of his proposed plan by going back to ours. The Senator is wrong, however. Pennsylvania receives 6.15 per cent under the pending bill. The Senator is wrong in stating that under the terms of the bill Georgia would receive more than Pennsylvania; it

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President-The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he has the figures as to the relative rural population of Georgia and New

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can give them to the Senator. The rural population of New York is 1,928,000. The rural population of Georgia is 2,000,000. The rural population of Pennsylvania is 3,034,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Are not small towns embraced in that classification of rural population?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The rural population, as taken by the census, is found in towns of less than 2,500 inhabitants. That has been the rule in the classification between urban and rural population since we have had a census. The specialists who have had charge of the problem of seeking to find a basis of separation between urban and rural adopted that rule, and it has been continuously recognized in the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of fact, I presume Georgia really has more than three times the rural population that New York has, because Georgia has very few towns; and that is true of most of the States in the South.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As the Senator from Iowa has said, if we should change to what is termed agricultural population the discrepancy would be far greater, but the division has been placed at the place which our census enumeration for years has been made.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If I may interrupt a moment, I should like mr. O'GORMAN. If I may interrupt a moment, I should like to make a statement in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi. New York State has about 150 cities with a population of 2,500 or more. The State of Mississippi has 29 cities or towns with a population of 2,500 or more. The State of Georgia has 45. The State of Iowa has 70.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I wished to do was to point out the result of the plan offered by the Senator from Iowa, to show how completely it took care of Iowa, and how it treated New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. I have run through the calculations, and it cuts the distribution to over 30 States. It substantially increases it to a small number of States around

Now, the difference between those States and most of the States of the Union is in the size of their farms, and the difference in the size of the farms is due to the character of the land, which makes possible cultivation by machinery and enables one man to do vastly more than several men might do in other sections. I return to the proposition with which I started: No plan of distribution could be perfect. The Senate committee did not select this plan, nor did the House committee. I did not select it. Mr. Lever did not select it. The presidents of the colleges of agriculture, together with officers of the Department of Agriculture who are to have charge of this work, comprehending the character of the work they were to do, with a broad vision of the entire country, in the interest of no locality, with no purpose but a purpose of national service, selected rural population as the basis of distribution. When I introduced the bill I had no idea what part would go to Georgia and what part would go to Iowa. Indeed, only in the last few days has my attention been called to that subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator says that no plan of distribution would be perfect, and I agree with him, on account of the great variety in agricultural pursuits, the great differences in the size of the farms, and the nature of the products. Inasmuch as two plans are presented here, however, one by the Senator from Iowa and one by the Senator from Georgia, and as it is conceded that neither one can be perfect I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia what he would think of this method of compromise: Adopt both plans, give each factor an equal value, and make the distribution in some such way as this, so that it would read:

Such additional sums shall be used only for the purposes hereinbefore stated, and shall be allotted annually to each State by the Secretary of Agriculture and paid in the manner hereinbefore provided, in the proportion which the rural population of each State bears to the total rural population of all the States, and in the proportion which the acreage of improved land in farms of each State bears to the acreage of improved land in farms of all the States, each factor to be given equal value in arriving at the result.

The effect of that would be a compromise midway between the proposition offered by the Senator from Georgia and the proposition offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would not be as bad as the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, but not nearly so good as the bill as it stands.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would be only half as bad as the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I should like to ask the Senator what he means by the statement that no plan is perfect. I assumed that he meant by that to admit that certain inequalities grow out of the extreme plan which he presents, which obviously is apt to favor certain States, just as certain inequalities grow out of the plan which is presented by the Senator from Iowa. In view of the fact that neither plan is perfect, would not the suggestion of some such compromise as that I have suggested appeal to the sense of justice of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Montana will wait just one moment, I wish to answer the Senator from Nebraska.

What I mean by saying that no plan would be perfect is that we can not find any exact census enumeration that will give us with absolute accuracy the people engaged in agricultural pursuits and the people who are to be reached and trained in agriculture. I think the only plan that would be absolutely perfect would be one that made our distribution exactly according to the people to be taught and who are to be advanced in their work through the results of this bill, but that a distribution according to rural and urban population is the most accurate basis we can find to accomplish the result which ought to be accomplished.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course the Senator realizes that in taking out of the Treasury of the United States money that has been put there by the power of taxation and in making a distribution of that money to the various States it is of the utmost importance to have it done in such a way as not to arouse in any direction a feeling that an injustice is being perpetrated. That is the reason I am moved to suggest this compromise. It is a very delicate matter to have even the suspicion of an injustice under which, if you look at the figures, certain regions of the country seem to be getting more than their share of benefit. I desire particularly to urge upon the Senator from Georgia again the idea that if he admits that the method of distribution which he has proposed is not perfect there ought to be some middle ground agreed upon by way of a compromise, under which two factors instead of a single factor could be taken, as more likely to arrive at a reasonable adjustment of the differences.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the mere addition of another factor, unless that factor is one in the direction of greater equality, does not necessarily improve it; and the factor of distribution according to the improved farm lands is entirely, of distribution according to the improved ratin tails is entirely, contrary to the spirit and purpose of the bill, which is to teach people, to instruct men, women, and children. It adds an element that carries us further off in our distribution from a plan which would distribute according to the people to be instructed. The perfect plan, I think, would be one that would enable us to answer that question exactly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia what reason there is for Representatives or Senators from an urban population to vote for this distribution of money to agricultural districts? If there is any theory at all upon which it can be defended, it is that the effect of the distribution of this money for the purpose of educating the farmers is to reduce the cost of living by reducing the cost of food. The Senator from Georgia will realize that the great prairies out here that are cultivated, as he says, by machinery more than by men, are the very regions where the food of the cities is produced; and it is in the improvement of agricultural conditions upon those great fields that the man living in the city can hope, by an increase in the production of food, to secure a reduction in his cost of living. So there is some basis for maintaining that the money to be taken out of the Treasury should be distributed not only in proportion to the number of people living in rural districts, but also in proportion to the possibilities of improving the food product of the great western farms, not for the benefit of the westerners, not for the benefit of the farmers of the West, but for the benefit of the dwellers in cities, the cost of whose food is increasing year by year, and the cost of whose living is being raised in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the small farms around the big cities, the small farm in New Jersey, the small farm in New York, the small farm in Pennsylvania, the small farm in Maryland, and in the balance of the States will be increased in their capacity to furnish this food by the training to be given to the individual man, and the training given to the individual man as a result of this bill is the training which will increase the food supply and take care of the great cities, as well as the rural population.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I rose to inquire of the Senator from Georgia about the origin of this basis of distribution. We know, as a matter of course, that measures of this character have had the consideration of the professional educators of the country for quite a number of years. Was the basis of distribution the subject of consideration by the committee? And from what source, if outside of the committee, did this suggestion of distribution on the basis of rural population come?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It came from the executive committee of the colleges of agriculture and from Dr. True, the director of the experiment stations of the United States. I have already given their names—Dr. Thompson, of Ohio; Dr. Russell, of Wisconsin; Dr. Butterfield, of Massachusetts; Dean Jordan, of New York; Dean Curtis, of Iowa; and Dr. True, director of the experiment stations.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator advise us whether the question of the proper basis of distribution was ever the subject of consideration in any of the national conventions of educators?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not recall that fact. I recall the fact that in discussing the subject they regarded it as a matter of instruction to be given to men and women and children

Mr. WALSH. Then what does the Senator mean by saying, in answer to the question, that the language originated with them? Did they draft the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They brought us the bill with that provision in it.

Mr. WALSH. Which was the basis of your report?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; which was the basis of the final bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Georgia remember the basis adopted in the Lever bill which passed the Senate in the last Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It used this language.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator remember the basis that was adopted in the bill presented by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It used the language "engaged in

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator does not mean to say that there never has been any discussion with regard to this basis,

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say that. What I said was that I could not recall any discussion in conventions. The Senator from Montana asked me if the subject had been discussed in any of these conventions.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator from Georgia means to say is that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry did not consider it; that is, there was no discussion there with regard to the basis. I think he said that the other day, and I have accepted that as being true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not recall any discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Georgia does not mean to leave the impression that the deans of agriculture to whom he has referred were unanimous in favor of any such basis as this, does he?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite sure they were not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I simply have no information about I only know that the measure came to us indorsed by all

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I know something about it. was a good deal of difference of opinion among these deans. was not present at any of their consultations; I only know from hearsay; but they finally did settle down upon this plan. It never has received investigation at the hands of a committee of the Senate, and it is now receiving its first real consideration, save as it was considered at the hands of this committee composed of members from various agricultural colleges

I am saying that only in order that we may all know that it is an open question, and that the Members of the Senate have never really taken it up and looked at it from all its sides, as I hope they will now. If the Committee on Agriculture and Forhope they will now. estry had gone into the matter-and possibly there was no reason why it should-and had deliberated upon it and had reported as it has reported, one might think that it was taking the first step, anyhow, toward its settlement legislatively. think, however, the Senator from Georgia means to be under-stood as saying that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry did not regard it as a disputed point, and therefore allowed it to come into the Senate without any discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not say that that is true. There was no objection made to the plan from any source. first objection I have heard urged was by the Senator from

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Georgia must remember, I am sure, that there has been a good deal of discussion arising over the Lever bill of the last Congress and over the Page bill of the last Congress and over the Page bill of the last Congress with regard to the proper basis of distribution. We did not discuss it here because we never reached, probably, a stage at which it could be discussed here; but there has been a good deal of discussion through the colleges about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was not referring to the colleges en. The Senator had directed my attention to discussions in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I stated that there was no discussion; that an explanation was made of the plan of distribution, and it was accepted by everyone as a proper plan. I had stated before that there may have been discussion of the plan of distribution in some of the gatherings of the presidents of the colleges at some of their conventions, but with regard to that I was not familiar. All that I knew was, so far as the heads of the colleges of agriculture were concerned, that they brought up this plan, and they unanimously presented it to us, and it seemed to us a fair and just plan, the object being to give instruction to those who were or would be connected with agricultural work, the object being to train men, women, and children so that a greater product would come from the soil and considering that the number to be taught was the element which probably would settle, at least to the largest extent, if not entirely, the cost of the instruction. So far as the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is concerned, there was unanimity in, or at least no dissent from, the plan of distribution presented to us by the executive committee of the colleges of agriculture and by the director of the experi-I might say that Dr. Knapp informally conferred with them also. The plan of distribution which they presented was accepted by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, understanding what it was and believing that it was sound, though it was not subjected to adverse criticism there. How much adverse criticism there may have been amongst the deans of the colleges or the presidents of the colleges before they reached the conclusion I do not know. They brought us this conclusion, and we thought it sound, and we accepted it without undertaking to make a calculation as to what State would receive the most money.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There was no difference of opinion among the heads of the colleges as to this plan of distribution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. None was ever suggested to us. Mr. VARDAMAN. Were there representatives from every agricultural college in the United States on that board?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They finally had an executive committee of five.

Mr. VARDAMAN. From what States were they?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ohio, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, New York, and Iowa. Dr. True was originally from New Hampshire, but he is now from the whole United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There was really no difference of opinion respecting it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. None at all.

You will find in the report of the Agricultural Committee upon the bill at the last session letters, I think, from the president of every agricultural college in the United States indorsing this bill. The colleges could not be more thoroughly committed to it than they have been. Conventions all over the country of farmers have indorsed it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is no doubt about that. They indorsed the Page bill with equal heartiness, and the Page bill had an entirely different method of distribution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Some of them did indorse it. Mr. CUMMINS. I think I heard the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] state here one day that he had the approval for the bill of every prominent educator of the country save one. not remember who the exception was, but that is my recollection of his statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You will find quoted in the reports of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the last Congress the language of approval by the heads of the colleges of the bill, which was then pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Georgia will yield to me, I have just received a communication from Dr. True, with whom I had a conference this morning, dealing with the very subject the Senator is now discussing. With the Senator's permission I should like to read that communication.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator while he reads it, then I wish to call attention to a few other indorsements.

Mr. SIMMONS. The letter is as follows:

United States Department of Agriculture, Office of Experiment Stations, Washington, D. C., February 2, 1911.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS, United States Senate.

distribution of the fund. The relative advantages of the distribution, according to areas of farms, cultivated land, and rural or agricultural population, were discussed on the basis of figures taken from the last census. Inasmuch as the work proposed in this measure is essentially educational, it was decided as a fundamental proposition that it would be better to make the distribution of money according to people rather than land. By increasing as much as possible the efficiency of people engaged in agriculture it was believed that agricultural production would be promoted in the highest degree. If the farmers became more intelligent and progressive and were informed regarding the best methods of agriculture, they would be in a position to utilize the land in the best way. This would lead on the one hand to an extension of cultivated area as far as this was practicable, and on the other hand to a greatly increased production per acre and per man. This might lead to some readjustment of the location of the farm population, but on the whole would result in greater production and more prosperous agricultural communities.

It was realized that if the Federal funds for extension work were distributed on the basis of rural or agricultural population, a number of States which have the largest areas of cultivated land and where agriculture is practiced on an extensive system with machinery and horses, would receive relatively less than the States where cultivated areas are not so extensive and a more intensive system of agriculture, involving a large amount of human labor, is practiced. But it was thought that If the basis of distribution of the funds was made the areas of improved farm lands, the former group of States would be given too much advantage.

In considering the work proposed under this measure the term "agriculture" is used in its broad sense to include not only the growing, truck farming, and other forms of horticulture, as well as dairying, poultry raising, etc. The more intensive agricultural occupatio Approved.

I wish to add, Mr. President, that in addition to what is said here, in the conversation I had this morning with Dr. Galloway, Prof. Spillman, and Dr. True, I gathered from what they stated that the subject as to what is the proper basis of distribution of this fund was one very much discussed and very thoroughly considered, and that the conclusion stated in this letter was

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina what he refers to when he says it was discussed with these college professors? Does he mean to say that it was discussed before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

that reached after most mature discussion and consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. I meant that the question of the proper basis for the distribution of the fund was discussed by the gentlemen who are referred to in this letter of Dr. True.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to say as a member of the Agricultral

Committee

Mr. SIMMONS. He does not refer to the committee at all. Mr. GRONNA. It has not been discussed before that committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. He does not refer to any discussion by the committee, if the Senator please. I will read again the first part of it. He says:

When the Lever bill for agricultural extension work by the State agricultural colleges was being drafted, the executive committee of the Association of American Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations and myself were consulted with reference to the basis of distribution of the fund. The relative advantages of the distribution according to areas of farms, cultivated land, and rural or agricultural population were discussed on the basis of figures taken from the last census.

The Senator is mistaken. There was nothing said in my conversation with Dr. True and Dr. Galloway this morning about any discussion before the committee. It was confined to a discussion between the representative of the agricultural colleges and the representative of the national experiment stations, but I did gather from them, as I do from the letter, that the dis-cussion as to what is the proper, the fair and equitable, and the most beneficial basis of distribution is a subject that was very thoroughly gone into by them and that they reached a conclusion, and the conclusion is that embodied in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to state again, unless there may have been confusion about what I said, that I did not say there was any discussion before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I did not say that there was not a discussion before the board representing the colleges. What I said was that I did not know of any discussion in any convention in which the question of the distribution was carefully considered. I did not mean by that to treat the committee as a convention. I understood that representatives of the colleges and the Director of the Experiment Stations and the Secretary of Agriculture had gone into the subject and satisfied themselves as to what was the best plan for distribution, but I have seen no record that in any of their conventions where they were all together the subject of distribution was discussed. I think in those conventions, as the Senator from Iowa has indicated, it was the general scheme of the bill that they were in favor of, and they never undertook to consider it in detail.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not question the statement of the Senator from Georgia at all. The Senator will remember that there was a subcommittee appointed, and undoubtedly the question was taken up with the subcommittee. I did not happen to be a member of that subcommittee. As the Senator knows, it was not discussed before the entire committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the committee itself it was not discussed.

Mr. GRONNA.

Mr. GRONNA. No. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The plan was stated and explained and nobody questioned the soundness of the plan. The place where I know it received the most thorough discussion is indicated in this letter from Dr. True. I know that the present Secretary of Agriculture and the former Secretary of Agriculture approved it, and I understood, also, that Dr. Knapp was consulted. I knew the older Dr. Knapp, in treating of the question of farm teachers through demonstrations or through farm leaders, has stressed the fact that the number of the teachers must have reference to the number of people to be

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the main purpose of this legislation. It will be of no particular service to the State which I in part represent. That State for many years has made ample provision for vocational and agricultural education. Many other States have made ample provision along those lines. This is peculiarly a State function. It is a duty of the State to educate its citizens. I am well aware that in some States this duty has been overlooked or neglected. I recognize the fact that there may be reasons, and perhaps satisfactory reasons, for those conditions, and in a broad way I recognize the need of the Federal Government to exert itself to do something for the advancement of agricultural education throughout the country.

But while I approve of the main purpose of this legislation, the bill itself is far from satisfactory. It proposes to take out of the National Treasury vast sums of money, beginning with an appropriation of $480,000, and each year thereafter for four years there will be an additional appropriation of $600,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise simply to suggest to the Senator from New York that the Senate has amended the bill so that the appropriation of an additional $600,000 continues for seven

Mr. O'GORMAN. For seven years, and that is to be followed, I read the bill correctly, by a permanent appropriation of $3,000,000

Mr. SMOOT. More than that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The permanent appropriation is just a little over $5,000,000. I am simply suggesting that, not because I am opposed to the addition.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understand.
Mr. CUMMINS. I am very much in favor of it.
Mr. O'GORMAN. The language I am now reading from the bill speaks of $3,000,000, but in connection with the other appropriation it would average, as the Senator from Iowa states, something like $5,000,000 a year, and that is intended to be a permanent charge on the Treasury of the United States. And why? Because certain States, few in number, for reasons which we need not now discuss, are not fully discharging the duty which, as I said, every State owes to every one of its citizens to provide the means of an education. It is surely not a duty resting upon the Federal Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. To what States does the Senator refer to as not discharging their duty?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am speaking of no particular State. I am stating that the State I represent does not ask for this legislation. This is, however, but preparatory to the main objection I have to the bill.

I can sympathize with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] when he spoke of the difficulties in the way of adopting a purely just and equitable method for the distribution of this money. Every plan that has been suggested is to my mind very objectionable. The three States to which the Senator from Georgia alluded a little while since, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, have a population of 19,000,000 people, almost 20,000,000, which would be one-fifth or 20 per cent of the entire population of the country. And yet under the language of the pending bill those three States, representing approximately 20 per cent And yet under the language of the pending of the entire population, receive but about 1 per cent of this

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The total amount of the three States, I think, would aggregate out of the $3,000,000 appropriation, on that basis, something like $330,000 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is over 10 per cent.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes; I will correct the statement; they receive a trifle over 10 per cent, which shows quite a disparity between what they are receiving and what they presumably contribute to the Public Treasury.

I should have no objection, considering the great good that may come from this legislation, to have these appropriations for a period of about five years. Any feature of this proposed legislation which would require a drain on the National Treasury for an indefinite period should not be regarded favorably by the Senate; and with respect to such a provision, I am in direct opposition. At the proper time I shall offer an amend-ment to strike out the provision on page 4, lines 1 and 2, pro-

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know that I should have engaged in the discussion at all but for the fact that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], as I understand him, attacks the merit of this proposition. I had supposed that there was hardly a division of sentiment in the Chamber as to the merit of the general proposition. I had supposed that the system which it is now proposed to extend and enlarge had been so thoroughly tested out in recent years by actual experimentation in practically all the States of the Union that its benefits were so obvious there were no dissenters whatsoever and that everybody was agreed that it was a good thing, and that the Government ought to go into it more thoroughly and extensively than heretofore,

Mr. President, there is one fact in our economic history during the 127 years that we have been an organized Government that, to my mind, stands out more prominently than any other. Everyone knows that at the beginning of that period the chief industry of the people of this country was agriculture. We had very little manufacturing. We had very little commerce. The era of railroads had not yet dawned. When the Civil War began that situation had not been very materially changed. Agriculture was still the dominant pursuit of the people. Manufacturing had not been developed except to a very limited extent. Our commerce had not reached very large proportions,

For the last 50 years, beginning at the close of the war, there has been a very remarkable change in that situation. To-day our manufacturing interests are abreast of those of any nation upon the earth. To-day our commerce is equal to that of any nation upon the face of the earth. To-day our transportation system is equal to that of any nation upon the earth, if not the best in the world. But it is a fact, and a lamentable fact, that to-day the United States of America is more backward in its agriculture than any nation of the world standing in the same class with the United States.

Now, what has brought about that result? Mr. President, I am not speaking about this in a partisan sense, and I am not speaking about it for the purpose of either criticizing it or ap-We know that at the close of the war the Government entered upon a policy of aiding and promoting the development of its manufactures and by indirect taxation, by indirect subsidies, by indirect bounties, the people of this country have contributed to the development of our manufacturing industries millions upon millions, yea, billions upon billions of dollars. As I said, as the result our manufacturing industries are abreast of and probably a little in advance of those of any other nation upon the earth.

We started about the same time upon a career of aiding our railroad development by land grants, by subsidies, both on the part of the National Government and the State governments and county governments and municipalities. During that period of time, through this public donation, so to speak, we have con-tributed millions and billions of dollars as a bounty toward the development of our railroad system in this country. body knows it, no one knows it better than the farmers of this country, that during all this period when we have been helping in the development of our manufacturing, when we have been helping by bountles in the development of our railroad system, when we have been helping by annual contributions in the development of our water transportation, we have been doing practically nothing to aid the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. President, partly as the result of that and partly as the result of other factors which need not now be discussed, we have this condition, obvious to everybody in the country to-day, that agriculture is behind every other industry, and we are actually reaching a condition in this country where we are not producing much more than enough to supply our own population. A country with the broadest acres, a country with the most fertile soil, a country with a people inherently adapted to agriculture, is hardly producing enough to supply the actual needs of the country. In that situation, when we come here and ask for the expenditure of what in comparison with the end to be attained is the pitiful sum of $600,000 a year, to be gradually increased as the demands may require until it requires the small sum of $5,280,000 a year, we are told that this is a degree of liberality toward the farmers which the Government can not afford, and that we ought not to indulge in it. Mr. President, I confess I do not appreciate that sort of an argument.

I want to say again what I said a few days ago, that during my service in the Senate it has seemed to me that whenever it is proposed to make an appropriation for the benefit of agriculture the Senate at once became penurious and stingy and closefisted. I have noticed since I have been here that we pass appropriation bills carrying a hundred million dollars or more for the Navy, nearly $100,000,000 for the Army-$40,-000,000, $50,000,000, or $60,000,000 once a year, I believe— $80,000,000 for rivers and harbors, carrying two or three hundred million dollars for the Post Office Department, and we have passed at times those great appropriation bills here with-

When the little Agriculture appropriation bill comes in here. it generally carries from twelve to fifteen million dollars. When I first came here, I do not think it carried quite $12,-000,000, though it probably has now reached $16,000,000. I am not sure about the figures, but I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] will probably corroborate me, that it is not much over $16,000,000; and if it is $16,000,000, it has just reached that amount, for it has generally been from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000. We have sometimes haggled over it, debated it, analyzed it, dissected, and criticized it for days, and sometimes for weeks, before we could get the bill through, and this has struck me with amazement, Mr. President, in view of the fact that we are still a great agricultural country, and most of us represent agricultural constituencies and ought to be deeply interested in everything that contributes to the benefit of agriculture. It has been demonstrated conclusively-it is not a matter of theory; it is not a matter of conjecture, but it has been conclusively demonstrated—that through the medium of this demonstration instruction the productivity of the lands in this country has been greatly increased and is being increased every day in the year. We have been heretofore making small appropriations for that purpose. I think our appropriation now amounts to something like $400,000 for that particular purpose, but the effect has been electrical. There is not a farmer, certainly in my section of the country, who does not believe that the benefit of this instruction that the Government has brought to him at his very door has been worth tenfold more than it cost the Government. I do not believe that instruction through bulletins and things of that sort has resulted in one-tenth the benefit to the farmers of this country as has this practical demonstration.

We have now 48 States, Mr. President; we have more than 6,000,000 farmers in this country to be instructed, and we are proposing here to begin a little appropriation, amounting to less than a million dollars the first year and finally getting to about $5,000,000, which is less than $1 to every farmer, to assist in teaching him what? In teaching him how to make two blades of grass grow where one now grows; in teaching him how to increase the productiveness of his wheat lands, his cotton lands, and his potato lands; and, in the name of heaven, do the farmers not need to be instructed in that direction? It is humiliating for an American farmer to go to Europe and find how much more the European farmer is producing on an acre of ground than the American farmer is producing.

trouble is not so much that there are not enough people living in the rural districts engaged in agriculture in order to supply the food wants of this country, but it is that we are producing such small quantities per acre.

I do not conceive of any way in which we can confer a greater benefit upon the people of this country as a whole—not only the bread consumer, but the man who produces the corn and the wheat out of which the bread is made—than by teaching the farmer practically how he can make more wheat per

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cum-mins] intimated that probably the South was getting rather more than her share of the present appropriation. That may be justified if you take the amount that has been spent in the South and the amount that has been spent in other sections

The Senator from Iowa, however, overlooks the fact that one of the appropriations that go to make up the total amount that is now being spent in connection with agricultural demonstration work in the South was an appropriation made specifically for the purpose of meeting the conditions created by the existence of the boll weevil. The department made an effort to combat the boll weevil. They failed in that effort. As a result of much study and much experimentation, however, it was finally determined that the only way to reach the boll-weevil evil was with reference to the manner of culture; and the department came here, not asking, as in the case of the gypsy fly that so much troubles the trees in the section of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], and asked for an appropriation to stamp out the fly; they did not come, as they do in cases of the diseases of cattle and diseases of sheep and ask for an appropriation to stamp out the diseases, but they came and said, "We can not combat the boll weevil; we have got to circumvent it by methods of culture;" and they asked for an appropriation to enable them to demonstrate to the farmers the particular method of culture by which the boll weevil might be circumvented and its march arrested. Through the use of this specific boll-weevil fund-and that is practically the only use of it that has been made in the South—the march of the boll weevil has been arrested, and even in the fields where it has taken possession it has, to a measure, been made innocuous.

So, if the South has seemed to get more than its share of this appropriation it has been on account of the boll weevil, just as we have made appropriations with reference to diseases of live stock or with reference to diseases of trees and similar appropriations which were expended altogether in the North or in the West. There is a general fund that has nothing special to do with this demonstration work, but yet is spent on account of the farmers, that is distributed throughout the country without any reference to local conditions.

I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that I do not agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Vardaman] about the question of color. I do not think that this fund ought to be given to the South because we have colored people there who are not quite such efficient laborers as are the white men of the West. I am not making any appeal here on account of the colored population of my State. The colored man is one of our burdens; we have accepted him as such; we are dealing with him with fairness. He is developing; he is growing; he is becoming a factor in the industry of the South. Largely he is yet occupied with agriculture, but he is an independent farmer. The idea that the colored men of the South are mere hirelings on the farm is a mistaken idea. In my section of the country and I think that is true of most of the South; possibly not so true of Louisiana and of Mississippi as it is of the balance of the South, but certainly in Georgia and in Alabama and in the Carolinas—the colored man is an independent farmer.

On my little farm I should say that more than half of my tenants are colored people; they own their teams; they rent their lands; they either pay a certain amount of money or they pay a part of the crop. They cultivate the land upon their own initiative; they do not come to the landowner or to the superintendent of the farm and ask how their farm is to be cultivated. So he must be treated as an independent farmer, having his own notions about farming; and he has notions about it-and they are very firm and fixed and stubborn notions, too-which you can not get out of his head by telling him that they are bad or that some other plan is better. You can not get them out of his head by sending him literature. The only way you can get these notions out of his head, if they are bad—and in some instances they are bad, because he is not a very successful farmer—is to teach him by object lessons the better way; to show him some particular method by which he can increase the yield of his cotton patch, his corn patch, or his potato patch.

Let him see as a matter of actual demonstration the wellcultivated land right by the side of his poorly cultivated land, and let him see the method employed from day to day in developing the new cultural methods, and next year he will adopt them, for he is an imitative creature. Show him they are good and he will adopt them, but you have got to show him by demonstration. Therefore, Mr. President, there is no class of farmers in the South to-day that are being more benefited by this demonstration work than are the independent colored farmers of the South.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Practically all of them are independent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; practically all of them are independent.
One of the troubles, I think, which the farmers have down there with their colored tenants is to get them to adopt the methods that they indicate to them are the better methods and of abandoning old methods. You can only get the colored farmer to do it, as I have said, by actual demonstration work.

Mr. President, if I have a proper conception of the object of this bill, it is to instruct men in the art of farming, to teach them how to better farm, to teach them how more economically to farm, to teach them how to farm so as to produce a greater result in the cultivation of their land. It is the man that this bill seeks to teach; it means to teach the man of small means who has a one-horse farm as much so as the man who has a hundred-horse farm. It means, not as the Senator understood me to say the other day when I asked him a question, that we are going to go to every individual farmer, that a demonstrator. is to stop at his house and go out next morning and give him demonstration; but it does mean that in every community where this system is to be put into operation, within a reasonable radius, every farmer, small or great, may have an opportunity to come; that there is going to be an actual demonstration of methods, so that they may see the work as it is done this week and next week, as the crop develops, from the time that the land is prepared into a seed bed and the seed is sowed and germinates and grows into a plant.

I know that there is one Member of this body who probably owns 10,000 acres of improved land. In my section of the country, where the farms, according to the census, would average, I think, about 80 acres, that is more than 100 farmers In the area that is embraced and encompassed in the farm of that one Senator to whom I refer there will be living 100 or 150 independent farmers. This bill seeks to reach every one of them. If you give them their money in proportion to their acreage and give the individual Senator to whom I have referred in proportion to his acreage, that Senator will get as much of this money for the purposes of instruction to him in the better method of farming his own land as those 100 or 150 farmers in my State will get.

But you say that you produce more per man, and that the standard should be how much a man produces in this country. I suppose, if you will take the census reports, that you can show that in the western country very much more is produced per man than in the southern country, but you can not show that you produce more per acre in the western country than we do in the southern country. The difference is merely apparent; it is not real; you do not produce more per man. at the Agricultural Department this morning that a certain Member of Congress, before he came to Congress, himself cultivated, broke, harrowed, seeded, and harvested, with the assistance of machinery and eight horses, and no other help what-soever, 400 acres in wheat. That was not the work of one man; that was the work of eight horses; that was the work of immense machinery that carried with it probably many, many horsepower. In my section of the country to cultivate in cotton 400 acres would take 30 or 40 men; and yet, when you get the results from your 400 acres of wheat you will not realize as much profit, or anything like as much—not one-tenth as much, probably—as would be realized from 400 acres in cotton. The difference is relative.

It will not do, Mr. President, it seems to me, to divide this fund upon the basis of the improved acreage, because in the western country, the section from which the Senator from Iowa has drawn his illustration, farming is done very largely by machinery-horses and machinery, steam plows, and implements of that sort. It is not done in that way at all in the South, and can not be done in that way. We in the South raise peculiar crops which place a limitation upon the amount of machinery that can be used. That is true of the cotton crop especially. You can not find any machine that will pick cotton, and yet the picking of the cotton is nearly one-fourth of the value of the raw cotton in the seed. You can not find machinery that will weed and hoe the cotton. That constitutes a large part of the labor and it has got to be done by the individual man. That has brought about the condition which we find in the South of small farms and the large number of people necessarily employed in order to cultivate a small area of land.

The intensive system of farming grows more and more in this country, and it will continue to grow. It has grown marvelously in my country since these demonstrations began down there; and I want to say in this connection—and I say it with a great deal of pride—that I do not believe there is another State in the Union that has increased the production per acre of its staple crops to the same extent during the last four or five years as has North Carolina. Two years ago, when I investigated the matter, North Carolina was the only State that had really increased that year its average yield per acre in wheat. It has increased its yield of corn from 15 to, I think, 22 or 23 bushels per acre, starting at a very low average, it is true. The increase in tobacco is in the same proportion; and, by the way, tobacco is a crop that you can not cultivate with machinery. Tobacco is our other chief staple crop. Cotton and tobacco are our main money crops. You can not employ machinery in growing cotton and tobacco, as you can in your wheat fields or as you can in your cornfields. With us corn is a by-product. We merely make it to feed our stock. We do not make much wheat; we do not make much grain. Our chief crops are the crops that can not be cultivated with much machinery; you have to cultivate them by hand; but the yield per acre in money is large. In my State the yield per acre this year averaged in tobacco from $200 to $300. Why? Because we are producing a better grade of tobacco than we have heretofore produced, and it is purely the result of the instructions that our people have received through the Agricultural Department with reference to the culture of tobacco and the kinds of tobacco best adapted to our climate.

Mr. President, I dislike, of course, to antagonize the wishes of the Senator from Iowa in this matter, because I do believe him to be a thorough-going, whole-hearted friend to the farmer, but I feel that the method of distribution which he proposes is not a just method of distribution. I have not heard of it having been advanced except in this debate. It seems that it has been discussed in connection with this bill by those who have been engaged in this work, not only here at Washington, but in various States in the Union, and that they have repudiated it and have agreed upon and recommended the method of distribu-

Mr. President, without going further into this discussionand I have said very much more than I intended to say when I began-I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will not prevail.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay a vote on this amendment, for I know the Senate is anxious to dispose of it and to pass the bill. I wish, however, to say a single word in regard to the vote which I shall give upon this amendment.

It seems to me, as has been said frequently in this debate, that the purpose of the bill is to instruct the farmer—that is, to instruct men—and therefore I think the distribution fund should rest upon the men who are to be instructed.

My own State is not a farming State; it is an industrial State. At the same time, we have a large number of small farms, and, though the total farm acreage has decreased somewhat in the last 30 years, I think, owing to the efforts of our agricultural board and our agricultural college, there has been a distinct improvement in the methods of production. farming is necessarily for the local market and is intensive. It seems to me that the small farmer, especially the farmer engaged in such farming as we have in my State and in some others of the densely populated industrial States of the East and the North, is the very man who needs more than any other all the aid that science can furnish; and for that reason it appears to me to be fairer to base the distribution of the fund on the rural population than upon the number of acres.

The average farm in Massachusetts is 77 acres; the average farm in some other States rises nearly to 400 acres. the acreage system, the amount that would go to one farmer in a State, with an average farm of 400 acres, would have to be distributed among four or perhaps five men in my State. It seems to me, therefore, that the proper way to do this is as the committee proposes; and for that reason I shall vote against the proposition to distribute the fund on the basis of acreage.

That, Mr. President, is all I desire to say. I merely wished to explain the vote which I was about to give.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has charged me with betraying a very deep interest in my own State. To that charge I plead guilty,

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I want to say that I did not make the charge, but I am sure the Senator does have such an interest in his State, and that he has rendered great service to it. That was what I meant; I certainly did not in any sense intend it to be anything like a charge.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have great affection for the State and have great pride in her people and in their accomplishments, but I hope that this interest does not lead me into a suggestion that does injustice to any other State.

The argument just made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], which is a repetition of the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons], seems fair, but it is fallacious. It is not true that we intend to devote this money to the education of those persons who are classified in the census report as belonging to the rural population. We intend to devote it to those persons who will take the instruction, accept the knowledge, absorb the science of agriculture, and in that way increase the great output of the farms of the country.

The Senator from Georgia says that Iowa has 83 per cent of her land in improved farms and that the average throughout the United States is but 25 per cent. He is quite right about that. I think it is 84 per cent rather than 83 per cent; but that correction is not material. We have in the United States 478,451,750 acres of land in cultivation. When I use the word "cultivation" I mean land that is commonly embraced within the meaning of the word "farm"; I mean the land that in rotation, whether it be in one crop or another, furnishes to the people of the United States their necessities in food and in clothing. Of these 478,000,000 acres of land that are thus in the service of the people of this country—acres that are annually pouring into the channels of trade our mighty agricultural product—Iowa has substantially 29,000,000; and when we go about the work of trying to make these 478,000,000 acres of land more productive, more fertile, when we go about inculcating the state of the productive of the people of the productive of the people of the productive of the people of the peopl the science of agriculture so that we may have our food and our clothing, in so far as agricultural products result in clothing, it is manifest that we ought to be guided by just one rule: What can we do that will make each of these 478,000,000 acres better answer the demands which the American people are making upon their soil?

My friends from Georgia and from North Carolina and from Massachusetts are insisting that if there are 20 people on 1 acre of land, they ought to have twenty times as much as one man on 1 acre of land. They are insisting upon a rule which, it seems to me, while seemingly fair, while very plausible, is fundamentally wrong—a rule that will not produce the results which the Senator from Georgia, I am sure, so fervently hopes will follow the passage of this bill. I am quite as much in favor of the appropriation as he can possibly be; but I am very far from being convinced that the appropriation will be a permanent one; that he will establish a permanent policy if he insists upon the unfairness in this distribution.

I note the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I say of it, as the Senator from Georgia saidfrom, however, a divergent standpoint—it is partly right; it is more nearly right than the plan of the bill, but not so nearly right as the plan I have proposed.

I earnestly hope this amendment will be adopted. I recognize the rather persuasive appeal of my friend from Georgia when he said that my amendment would reduce the proportion of the appropriation of 30 States. He is in error as to one State only. It does reduce the allotment of 29 States as I have computed it. It increases the allotment of 19 States. I desire the Senate to hear for a moment, however, just what it does with regard to the 29 States whose proportion of the appropriation is decreased.

Under the plan of the bill Maine has seventy-three one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Under the operation of the amendment

Maine has forty-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Under the bill New Hampshire has thirty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Under the amendment, nineteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Under the bill Vermont has thirty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent, and under the amendment thirty-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent, a difference of four one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Under the bill Massachusetts has forty-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent, and under the amendment twenty-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

Under the bill Rhode Island has four one-hundredths of 1 per cent, and under the amendment four one-hundredths of 1 per cent. There is no change in that,

For Connecticut the bill awards twenty-three one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Under the amendment Connecticut is awarded twenty-one one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

In New York the bill gives aid to agriculture to the amount of 3.91 per cent. The amendment I propose gives to New York 3.10 per cent, substantially the same.

Under the bill New Jersey has 1.28 per cent. Under the amendment New Jersey has but thirty-eight one-hundredths of 1

Under the bill Pennsylvania has 6.15 per cent. Under the amendment Pennsylvania has but 2.65 per cent.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa give me the figures for Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure. Under the bill Minnesota is given 2.48 per cent. Under the amendment Minnesota has 4.11 per cent.

I shall not pursue this further, because it may be wearisome. I have, however, stated enough to show that with the exception of Pennsylvania the changes are among those Northern States in which agriculture is of very subordinate interest, and the change is not large. The great changes are in the awards to the Southern States, and for reasons which were stated here on Saturday with the utmost frankness.

There is not any doubt with regard to the reason that led to I think no one who is familiar with the development of the subject can doubt the reason, whether it is a good reason or a bad reason, which finally led those who considered the matter to adopt the rule of rural population. I shall not enter upon that again, because it is so fully understood and was so fully debated on Saturday. The increases here are among those States which furnish the people of this country with more than 50 per cent of all its agricultural products. The decreases, with the exception of the 12 Southern States that I recapitulated Saturday, are among those States that have no great agricultural product, and that are awarded under the bill proportions so small that they become in and of themselves negligible and

The rule I have proposed divides the appropriation fairly among the people who actually produce the agricultural com-modities of which my friend from North Carolina [Mr. Sim-MONS] has spoken so eloquently and so wisely. There is no doubt about his position. We have neglected agriculture. We have given scant attention to the development of this science, whether in the States or by the General Government.

It is only within the last 10 rears that the thought of men has been turned toward the learning of agriculture. It is only recently that we have become acquainted with its beauty, because the science of agriculture is not only full of profit to those who pursue it but it is full of interest as well. I can conceive of no field of human learning so crowded with beauty as well as with profit as the field devoted to the development of agriculture.

I want no word I have said criticizing the manner in which this appropriation is to be distributed to reflect upon the purposes of the bill itself. The purposes of the bill are wise. They are comprehensive. If carried out they will yield in the future years a richer reward to the American people than any other like amount of money that has been or will be appropriated from the Public Treasury.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I understand the purpose in the mind of the Senator from Georgia it is that a given expenditure under the provisions of his bill will give the same quantum of information to the same number of individuals. If his bill means anything, if its intendment is anything, that must be the purpose, because it is based upon rural population. Yet can not the Senator easily see, comparing his own State with one of the larger agricultural States where the agricultural effort is principally employed in cereal raising, that he does not secure any such result? If under this bill there is a thousand dollars spent in my State and another thousand dollars spent in the State of Georgia, the thousand dollars spent in my State ought to reach just as many persons as the thousand dollars spent in the State of Georgia; but the Senator can easily see why that would be impossible under the bill as it is now framed.

Let us suppose here is a full section of land, 640 acres, 1 mile square. In my State that probably would be divided into four quarters, with a farmer on each quarter. If we had some establishment for demonstration in the center of that section it would give its illustration and its information to four persons. If it were in Georgia, with only 40 acres to each farmer, it would give the same instruction to 16 persons.

The Senator can easily see that under his bill he is getting four times as much benefit for his people individually as we are getting, because it will cost just as much to give this information to the four farmers in my State as it would cost to give it to the 16 in his State. I am speaking now of the physical demonstration. It will cost exactly the same. It does not add tions are held by men of the highest character and ability, to the expense that 16 pairs of eyes are viewing the work or that 16 pairs of ears are listening to the instruction that is being given. The real thing that you are going to affect, after all, is the 640 acres within the compass of those four lines. That is what you are going to increase in its productiveness. If that be the case, instead of our having just one-fourth as much as the State of Georgia, in order to get the same instruction and have it affect the same number of acres we would really have to have four times as much as the State of Georgia should have under this provision.

So I confess I can not see the justice of the distribution according to the rural population, as is suggested in the bill. If the real purpose is to increase the productive capacity acre for acre throughout the United States, we ought to have a course of instruction that would reach the greatest number of acres, and that, at a given expense, should be given to those States having the greater acreage so that it would equal the expense as it is applied where the population is much more dense than in the West.

If it were supposed that the appropriation we make would reach every farmer in every one of the States, of course it would make little difference whether we adopted the plan of the Senator from Georgia or whether we adopted the plan proposed by the Senator from Iowa. The expenditure of this sum of money can not by any possibility give instruction to all the agriculturists in all of the States, however; and as we can not reach them all, we ought to reach them upon some fair and equitable plan.

It does seem to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa is the most equitable and should adopted. For that reason I shall cast my vote in favor of the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate in taking a vote on the amendment, nor on the bill; but I desire to remind the Senators who have talked so earnestly about this bill that the farmer who raises grain, the farmer in the great West, has to depend on nomadic labor. Whether this bill is passed or not, we shall have to instruct the labor which comes from the cities.

In the South and in the East you have the same labor from year to year. It is not so with us; and, as my colleague has so well said, the expense of cultivating an acre of land should be and must be taken into consideration. Not only that, but where you employ men to handle intricate machinery there is infinitely more risk in leaving the machinery to those men than there is in leaving them with a hoe or with a spade, as is being done in some other sections of our country.

A great deal has been said about the benefit that is going to accrue to the American farmer from the passage of this bill. I have yet to find the first farmer who has asked for this appropriation; and I have made it my business to inquire, not only among the farmers of my own State, but among the farmers of other States. I am not opposing the bill, because I believe in scientific methods; but so far as it applies to our section of the country, I wish to say that the farmer in the West is not wholly ignorant of the new and scientific methods of farming. We have had for the last decade or two our agricultural institutes where the farmers go, and where they talk over new methods, not only of raising grain, but of rearing stock.

I might say, in this connection, that I have been criticized as opposing this measure. At no time have I opposed it; but I have favored a plan which has a wider scope, namely, the socalled Page bill. According to the arguments of Senators you are now trying to do under this bill exactly what was intended to be done under the Page bill, to educate each and every individual in vocations and trades. That is not the purpose of this bill. If it is, I misunderstand the language contained in the bill.

The purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is to aid in diffusing among a certain class of people in the United States practical knowledge and scientific methods in the industry in which they are now engaged. The bill states specifically that the money is to be used to disseminate practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics. This work is to be done in connection with the college or colleges in each State now receiving, or which may hereafter receive, the benefits of a certain act of Congress approved July 2, 1862.

It will be seen from the provisions of section 2 of this bill that the work is to be carried on in such manner as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State agricultural colleges receiving benefits from the act. The work is not specifically outlined in the bill, but is left to the judgment of the faculties of the various colleges and the Department of Agriculture.

who will work for the betterment of the conditions on the farm. we are apt to meet with disappointment, and the large sum of money which is appropriated by the bill will go to waste, so far as the farmer is concerned. We appropriate $480,000 per year, $10,000 of which is to be paid annually to each State which by the action of its legislature shall assent to the provisions of the bill. As the bill now reads there will be appropriated annually for a term of seven years an amount of $600,000, and for each year thereafter there is permanently appropriated the sum of $3,000,000, to become available to the colleges of the various States if the State appropriates a like amount, and to be paid in the proportion which the rural population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, as determined by the next preceding Federal census.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is designed to do justice to the States where the population is not so large. Take my State, for instance, the State of North Dakota: We produced in the year 1910, according to the Federal census, more than $311,000,000 of agricultural products, and yet you accord to us 1.03 per cent of this appropriation. Ours is purely an agricultural State. As my colleague has so well said, it requires more money to disseminate this knowledge among the farmers of our State than it does in the more thickly populated States. Under the plan proposed by the Senator from Iowa, North Dakota would get 4.28 per cent of the appropriation, to which I believe we are justly entitled. In other words, North Dakota would receive only $30,000 under this bill, provided the State legislature appropriated a like amount.

Out of the permanent annual appropriation of $3,000,000 based upon the rural population North Dakota would receive one and three-one hundredths of 1 per cent, or approximately $30,000; that is, if the State of North Dakota assents to this provision and appropriates a like amount. As I have stated, according to the Federal census, the total production of agricultural products for the year 1910 was more than $311,000,000. and it would seem that an unfair division and distribution is made of this money.

Mr. President, I have been criticized as being opposed to this bill, and while I am perfectly willing to admit that I believe that this bill will not be welcome by the farmer as a real help to him, it can not be truthfully said that I have opposed the passage of the bill because I have supported another bill which contains all there is in this bill and a great deal more. I have supported the Page bill, believing it to be a better bill, of far greater scope, and of real practical value to the people of the United States. The Page bill contains, as I have said, the same provisions that this bill contains, making appropriations for farm demonstration work and home economics; but it also provides for vocational education, and although I do not care to discuss in detail the provisions of the Page bill, especially that part of it which applies to vocational education, I want to say that it is my belief that there is more urgent need for the training of the American boy in the vocations and trades than there is in teaching the farmer how to farm. I know of no one who is opposed to improved methods of farming, and I want to say, for the information of my colleagues, that in the great empire of the West the farmer is not unmindful of the importance and the value of new and scientific agricultural methods. In the State which I have the honor in part to represent we have for the last decade had agricultural institutions and discussed every phase of the agricultural problems, not only the methods of how to produce and the harvesting of crops but the rearing and management of live stock. I am not ready to admit that our farmers are wholly ignorant in husbandry, and while we are not an old State we have learned long ago that rotation of crops and intensive cultivation is absolutely necessary in order to produce satisfactory results. Our farmers have learned how to conserve moisture and also how to put back that compound substance which furnishes nutriment to plants; they know that changing their wheat fields to tame grasses, to clover, and alfalfa, which extracts the nitrogen from the air and which is deposited in the earth through the roots of these plants, is not only important but absolutely necessary to plant life. The farmer has learned long ago how to properly care for the farm, and while he may not in all instances be able to give a lecture on it he knows how to do it.

Mr. President, I do not want to appear as in any way minimizing the value of scientific up-to-date farming, because personally I believe in it; but there is something more fundamental; there is something in which the farmer is more vitally interested, and that is in a market. I wish I could discuss this phase of it without having to refer to any party, but the legislation enacted during the last session of Congress, namely, the Simmons-Underwood tariff bill, has taken from the American farmer what properly belonged to him and which to him is the most valuable, namely, the American market. In his own country under the present tariff law the American farmer is obliged to compete with the world in selling his products. With the exception of a few articles, the products of the farm are not receiving the benefits that we accord to the products of the factory. That it has already had its damaging effects no one who is a student of the conditions of this industry will deny; that it has injured those who are now engaged in the industry and discouraged others who might engage in it no one who is qualified to speak on this subject can deny. What the farmer needs more than anything else is a proper method in the marketing of his products, better facilities in the distribution of his products, and methods of transportation and handling of his grain and stock which are less expensive. We can not expect that intelligent men will engage in an industry which they know by the experience of other intelligent men is not profitable; and while the theory advanced by the free trader, that in order to give the consumer cheaper food we can not afford to protect those who are engaged in the production of the necessities of life, is a beautiful theory, it, however, works an injustice on those who are engaged in it, and unless we have free trade in all our industries it can not be anything but a discrimination, and a discrimination against a class in which millions of people are engaged-an industry which can not be made a trust. By its very nature those who are engaged in the industry can not make it a monopoly and oppressive to the rest of mankind.

Mr. President, I dislike very much to disagree with my good friend the Senator from Iowa, but I do not admit that farming is profitable in all sections of the United States. I want to say to him and to the Senate that as an industry, as a business, farming is not a profitable industry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.
Mr. CUMMINS. Without going into a discussion as to whether it is profitable or unprofitable, I think the Senator from North Dakota must have misunderstood me, because I made no assertion with regard to the matter one way or the

Mr. GRONNA. I understood the Senator to speak of it as an industry which is beautiful as well as profitable.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I said the study of the science of agriculture is beautiful as well as profitable.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad to have the Senator's explana-tion, because as a farmer it sounded to me as though the Senator said that the industry of farming is a profitable one.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to say that it is not, Mr. President, but I did not enter on that subject. I was trying to suggest that a science which a few years ago was looked upon as a dry-as-dust affair is really one of the most beautiful fields of exploration that we have lately discovered.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand now that we can well proceed upon the theory that the science of agriculture is not only a beautiful one but a profitable one.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator on that point, but I do not admit that farming, especially at the present time, is profitable. If it was profitable, there would be no need of this cry coming from every human being in our land that we must get more people back to the farms. Human intelligence will seek the industries that are most profitable, and if the industry be profitable and if it be beautiful, as the Senator from Iowa so well says, the people of the United States will go back to the farm, and there would be no occasion for the people of the cities to interest themselves in the farmer to their own detriment and perhaps loss.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT, Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.
Mr. WORKS. I am very much afraid that the declaration of the Senator from North Dakota, who is himself a practical farmer, that as an industry farming is not profitable, will not be very greatly calculated to entice anybody back to the farm.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I consider that every word I say here in the Senate should be said truthfully, and I can say from my own experience as a farmer that this year I have lost several thousand dollars in the industry of farming.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?
Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. If my colleague will yield to me, I might suggest to the Senator from California that you are never going to get an excess of population from the city back to the farm again by any siren song of the beauties of nature. You have got to show those people a profit, and you are not going to show them much of a profit so long as you swing the doors of agriculture wide open to the products of all the world. As my colleague has justly said, if you will give the American farmer the American market I think the farmer would be able at least to live. But I agree with my colleague that there is no use of telling people that it is a beautiful occupation and get them to join in it when, as a matter of fact, we can not find a market for the products that we produce.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield with pleasure.
Mr. WORKS. I have always admired my good friend the junior Senator from North Dakota for his frankness and candor. I always expect of him a truthful statement of facts as he understands them. I was only moved to remark that the statement of the truth as he understands it is not calculated to entice anybody back to the farm.

Whatever the cause may be, whether it is because of unjust legislation on the part of Congress or something else, the fact seems to remain that the industry of farming is not profitable, and until something is done to make it profitable it is hardly fair to ask anyone to go back on a farm if he can make a living somewhere else. I regard that as very unfortunate, Mr. I am sorry to have it said here by a man who knows that farming is not profitable, because certainly it is important to this country that it should be made profitable and that the people should be called back to the farm instead of living, as they are, crowded in the cities.

Mr. McCUMBER. If my colleague will permit me—
Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. My colleague has already pointed out the way to make farming profitable-indeed, the only way to make it profitable in this country-and that is to give us the same protection that you give to the manufacturers. Give us the American market, protected to exactly the same per cent and extent, and I think we will make it at least reasonably profit-

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I said in some remarks I made a few days ago that what the farmer needs is not charity, is not legislation like this, in my judgment, but fair and just laws that will enable him to work out his own problems. Certainly the Senator from North Dakota can not lay it upon me that there has been any unjust legislation affecting the interests of the farmer. I have not believed in this bill because I do not believe it will bring relief or help to make farming profitable to the farmer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree with every word the Senator has said.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, there seems to be no disagreement or opposition among us, but I want to give a simple illustration. What industry is there in which a man is engaged in which he has to accept the price offered him by the buyer except the industry of agriculture?

We will take the industry of making shoes in the great State of Massachusetts and other eastern States where they are engaged in the manufacture of shoes. If a million pair of shoes are required and they are worth $2 a pair, do you suppose that those manufacturers are going to manufacture 2,000,000 pair and sell them for a less price? That is practically what the American farmer has to do. When you inproduction you decrease the price of his products. The farmer in raising wheat which costs him a dollar a bushel to produce-and I make the statement now that no man in the United States can raise a bushel of wheat for less than $1 a bushel. He is selling that wheat to-day for from 60 cents to 70 cents per bushel, and it does not take a very wise man to figure out that he is not making very much profit.

Supposing we allowed the men engaged in this industry, which is such a beautiful one, to transact business the same as people engaged in other industries, so that when the bushel of wheat costs $1 to produce he shall be allowed to add his profit to that cost, you place the American farmer upon a business method and the American farmer will succeed.

I resent, Mr. President, the statement that the American farmer is wholly ignorant about producing crops. We have We have in the Western States college graduates engaged in the industry of farming. They have spent a lifetime in that industry. They meet and confer with their fellow farmers as well as people in other industries meet and confer with their associates. I doubt very much, as I think was said by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] the other day, and so well said, if some of these so-called demonstrators can teach the western farmer anything about the new methods of pro-

Mr. President, I shall not oppose this bill; it is doing us no harm; but, as I said a moment ago, I have yet the first farmer in my State to hear from asking me to vote for legislation of this kind. I have yet to hear from the first farmer anywhere in this country asking me to support legislation of this kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the Senator from Georgia desires to continue the session until after the pending amendment is voted upon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. In that event I suggest the absence of a quorum, for there ought to be a majority of the Senate here.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Coll] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Clarke].

On account of his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. Pittman] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURTON. I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who is unavoidably detained from the Chamber to-day. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I am informed that I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Penrose], and I am also informed that I can transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Thomas]. I therefore transfer my pair to the Senator from Colorado and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. KERN (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley] has voted? The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. KERN. I withdraw my vote, being paired with that

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the negative). When I voted a moment ago, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks] was absent, but he is now in the Chamber. So I withdraw the transfer of my pair with him to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hollis], and will allow my vote to stand.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Clarke] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Sherman] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 41, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. Cummins was rejected.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, this bill provides in substance that there shall be appropriated $490,000 the first year, an additional appropriation of $600,000 for the next year, and each succeeding year for seven years there is to be an increase not exceeding $600,000 upon the sum appropriated for the preceding year. I have estimated that under this feature of the bill the total amount that will be taken from the Treasury of the United States in seven years will be $20,000,000.

Those provisions are succeeded by a provision making a permanent appropriation of $4,480,000 per year. I believe that we might very well content ourselves with the seven-year experimental period and not commit ourselves at this time to a definite policy which will require an appropriation of almost $5,000,000 per year for any indefinite period. To strike out the latter provision, retaining only the seven-year provision, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 3, line 24, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "year" where it occurs the first time in the line down to and including the word "provided" at the beginning of line 3, page 4, and also to strike out the word "permanently," in line 8, page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTINI

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). nounce my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. but I transfer it to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I reannounce my pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLean], and on account of his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I transfer the pair which I have with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger] to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hollis] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). nounce my pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. Perkins]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROOT (after having voted in the affirmative). On reflection, I think that I am not at liberty to vote on the pending amendment during the absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Thomas], but I will transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Maine [Mr. Burleigh] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I suppose I should have again, when my name was called, gone through the formality of announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Lippitt] and the transfer of that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I have just thought of the fact that I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Penrose]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. OVERMAN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator

So that, if amended, the proviso will read:

That pending the inauguration and development of the cooperative extension work herein authorized nothing in this act shall be construed to discontinue either the farm-management work or the farmers' cooperative demonstration work as now conducted by the Bureau of Plant Industry of the Department of Agriculture.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there are several other amendments, and therefore I can not hope to press the bill through to-night.

I desire to submit the following unanimous-consent agree-

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock on February 3 the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bill 7951 and vote upon any amendments that are pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after 4 o'clock no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes upon the bill, nor more than once nor longer than five minutes upon any amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will present the unanimousconsent agreement again, although I find it is going to be objected to. I was under the impression before that there would be no objection. I do not know that it is necessary to read it, but I present it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to state that I have pending an amendment which I consider of very great importance. In fact, I think it is of far greater importance than the amendment we have been discussing for three or four days. I did not know this request for unanimous consent was going to be presented. Under the circumstances, much as I regret to do so, I believe I shall have to object to it. I wish to assure the Senator in charge of the bill, however, that so far as I am concerned there will be no unnecessary delay in the discussion and consideration of the amendment I propose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 3, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON.

Monday, February 2, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We rejoice, our God our Father, in the consciousness of Thy presence, displayed in the works of Thy hands, in the mighty forces which environ us, in the love which provides for our necessities, in the faith which holds us to Thee, in the hope that inspires to action, in the love that quickens the affections. Strengthen our bodies, illumine our minds, widen our sympathies, and make straight our paths as we thus enter upon a new congressional week, that we may think wisely, act nobly, and thus fulfill the needs of an expectant people. And Thine be the praise, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 31,

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and send to the Clerk's desk an article which appeared in yesterday's New York Sun and several other newspapers throughout the country, in which my remarks before the Judiciary Committee on Saturday last in advocacy of an antitrust bill introduced by me have been misconstrued. I ask that the article be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York rises to a question of personal privilege. The Clerk will read the extract referred to, so that it can be seen whether there is a question of personal privilege involved in it or not.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Sun, Sunday, Feb. 1, 1914.]

CALLS ANTITRUST BILLS REVOLUTION BREEDERS—REPRESENTATIVE LEVY SAYS SUCH LEGISLATION STARTED FRENCH REVOLUTION.

WASHINGTON, January 31.

Declaring that the French Revolution came from "such obnoxious and drastic legislation" as is now proposed in the administrations antitrust program, Representative Levy, of New York, a Democrat and candidate for the United States Senate, told the House Judiciary Committee to-day that the Sherman law "has been the cause of panic and disaster to the entire country."

"It is astounding," said Mr. Levy, "that intelligent men should for one moment propose or agitate more drastic legislation than the present Sherman law. It has interfered with commerce and retarded our advancement and progress by 20 years."

Mr. Levy criticized legislatures for "their desire to pander to the violent demands of socialism, of communism, and pass laws not based on reason." He then praised the Supreme Court's "rule of reason."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to prevent the gentleman from being heard, but this does not present a question of personal privilege. I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be heard if he wants to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think any question of personal privilege is involved. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Levy] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; for seven minutes. Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the gentleman is accused of being a candidate for the United States Senate. That seems to me to constitute a question of personal rivilege. [Laughter.] Mr. BARTLETT. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman may have seven minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Bartlett] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New. York may have seven minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection. Mr. LEVY. No one is a more ardent admirer of the present administration than I, and no one is a more enthusiastic in-dorser of the propositions of the present administration to cor-rect the abuses of the Sherman law and make it more plain and clear to the public than I.

In order that my position may be made clear, I send to the Clerk's desk that portion of my remarks which has been misconstrued, so that they may be read for the information of the

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read it. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appear before you this moraing in advocacy of the bill (H. ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the Clerk's desk. Mr. CLAYTON. Of course, under the rule, Mr. Speaker, this conference report would have to be printed and lie over for one day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct about that. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The conference report, with the accompanying statement, will be printed under the rule.
Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report may be considered now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Clay-TON | asks unanimous consent that the report be considered now.

Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the report is. I would like to have the gentleman state in a word whether or not the Cullop amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I can tell the gentleman. Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, that ought to go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN]

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a letter of date January 12, 1914, relating to the bill H. R. 9266, in relation to cold storage of apples. It is a short letter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a certain document, which he names, in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I could not hear the request.

Mr. RAKER. The request is that I have inserted in the RECORD a letter of date January 12, 1914, from the Rives Bros., in California, in relation to H. R. 9266, the bill 9830, and the bill 9987, as to the effects of cold storage on apples.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman an estimate as to how many letters have been received on that subject by Members of

Mr. RAKER. This is so valuable and presents the subject so clearly and lucidly that I think it ought to go into the RECORD to show the attitude of the great apple interests of California upon this subject.

Mr. MANN. The other day I received a letter that was very lucid and very valuable, and I did the proper thing with it. I sent it to the committee that had charge of the matter, where it will receive lucid and valuable attention. [Laughter.] If it had been inserted in the RECORD they probably never would have seen it.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that sometimes when a letter is referred to a committee that committee is so busy and has so many matters before it, and so many parties appearing before it, that a valuable, clear, and lucid letter is not read by the committee. This one being so valuable, I thought it ought to go into the Record, so that it could in that way be called to the attention of the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has already read the letter himself?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; but I am only one of 434 Members.
Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that no one in the House will read it if it is inserted in the Record.

Mr. MADDEN. If I may be allowed to inject myself into this discussion-

Mr. RAKER. Certainly; I am always pleased to have the gentleman inject himself into any discussion.

Mr. MADDEN. It would be much more interesting if the gentleman would retain the letter until the matter is up for consideration in the House, and then let the gentleman portray the contents of the letter in the way in which nobody but he can do it.

Mr. RAKER. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, but If we wait until the matter is up in the House the committee will not read it, and we want a favorable report from the com-Therefore I want this to come to the committee in the proper channel—through the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The other day the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asked unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short resolution passed by the National Wool Growers' Association. I think it was the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] who objected to cumbering up the RECORD with such matters, and in his absence I do not think we ought to proceed to do it now.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman will not punish me for what some one else did to the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell].

Mr. MANN. I am only trying to protect the gentleman from Missouri in his absence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. RAKER. I thank the gentleman.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in the course of the debate on the immigration bill on Saturday, January 31, in a colloquy between my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and myself, some reference was made to the Solicitor of the Department of Labor. We were discussing at the time the matter of refunding the head tax of $5 to aliens who were being deported by the Department of Labor. It was rather incorrectly believed by me that my colleague [Mr. GARDNER] had indicated that the Solicitor of the Department of Labor had drafted the provision of the pending legislation.

May I just say that any reference I made to the Solicitor of the Department of Labor was not founded on fact. He did not draft the objectionable section. I may add that I know the Solicitor of the Department of Labor, Hon. John H. Densmore, of Montana. Mr. Densmore is a very able and attractive gentleman, who is worthy to fill not only the office which he now holds, but any office, even the highest, in the Department of Labor. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. I do not think the gentleman understood me correctly. I have no objection to the gentleman correcting any statement, but I said that the bill was drafted by the law officer of the Bureau of Immigration. I may or may not have mentioned his name. He is Mr. Parker.

YAKIMA INDIAN RESERVATION—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker-

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To ask to have referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. On January 14 I introduced the bill H. R. 11622, to provide water for the irrigable lands of the Yakima Indian Reservation, State of Washington, and for other purposes. As this bill deals only with Indian matters and Indian affairs, I think it should have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs instead of to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman consulted the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands about this proposed change of reference of this bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman think it would be courteous to the chairman of that committee to call his attention. tion to it before asking to have it transferred from his committee to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to do that. I never knew that that was necessary when the bill was plainly referred to the wrong committee.

Mr. GARNER. I think that is customary; and in the absence of my colleague from Texas I will ask the gentleman to let the matter go over until he can speak to him in regard to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no desire to be discourteous, and I will withdraw the request until I can consult with the chairman of the committee.

JUDICIAL PROCEDURE OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. Mr. McCOY. On Monday last the bill H. R. 10946, to regulate judicial procedure of courts of the United States, was under consideration on a motion to suspend the rules. I want to ask the Chair if it is in order now to move to recommit that bill to the Committee on the Judiciary? The Speaker will remember that the point of order was made that there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That would come up whenever suspension of the rules was in order.

Mr. McCOY. One further question, whether or not the order of business now is not to call the committees?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am not positive about it, but it occurs to me that under a ruling of the former Speaker of the House, Mr. Cannon, where a bill was under consideration on a motion to suspend the rules and went over, it did not thereby get any favored position; but the next day, when the suspension of the rules was in order, it would be considered. It would take its place as usual and be in order when such bills are called up under the rule.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can solve the problem by asking unanimous consent to have it recommitted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned two weeks ago on unanimous consent and suspension day, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCov] had moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and debate had been exhausted, and a vote was had. I made the point of no quorum. Personally I do not think the matter comes up again until the Unanimous Consent Calendar is disposed of, when we reach motions to suspend the rules, and then it is the right of the gentleman from New Jersey to withdraw his motion without asking unanimous consent.

Mr. BARTLETT. He has the right to do it whenever the bill is in order to be considered?

Yes. Mr. MANN.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the point I make.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to with-draw the motion now and have the bill recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the number of the bill?

Mr. McCOY. Ten thousand nine hundred and forty-six.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey? [After a pause.] The Chair hears

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 474. An act to authorize the issuance of absolute and unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases; and

S. 2563. An act for the relief of Rebecca C. Pepper.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Helm, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness

The SPEAKER laid before the House the request of Mr. AINEY for indefinite leave of absence, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say that I happen to know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY] is seriously ill in his apartments. at the Farragut, and I trust that no one will object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RECONSTRUCTION OF MILITARY ROAD BETWEEN FORT WASHAKIE AND JACKSONS HOLE, IN WYOMING.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a rereference of the bill (H. R. 10546) making appropriation for the reconstruction of a part of the military road between Fort Washakie and Jacksons Hole, in Wyeming. The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have discussed the reference with the chairman of the committee, and inasmuch as the road is within a forest reserve and the bill provides for its improvement by the forestry officers, it ought to go to the Committee on Agriculture. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs takes the same view.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be rereferred to the Committee on Agriculture.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I call attention of the Speaker to the fact that a rule was adopted last Friday by which I think the House automatically goes into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the immigration bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order, and make the point of order that the business before the House is the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has stated what I wanted to say, except that I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not crowd out the bills that properly come up under the Unanimous Consent Calendar even if he has the power, which I do not admit that he has. This is unanimousconsent day, and it is the only time that we can get up these little bills.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

I desire to be heard.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to be heard in favor of the position occupied by the gentleman from Alabama, to wit, that the order of business is the immigration bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the same side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, with due regard for the posi-would like to be heard on the other side of that very interesting parliamentary question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether it would not be practicable to devote the time to the Umnimous Consent Calendar which would otherwise be devoted to arguing this point of order and then proceed with the consideration of the immigration bill. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Houston] has a motion to suspend the rules, which will take only a few minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a request for unanimous consent, and then we will see whether we can get away from this hour or hour and a half discussion on the point of order. I ask unanimous consent that the time up to 2 o'clock p. m. be devoted to the consideration of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and that at that time, or sooner if the calendar be disposed of, the House automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the immigration bill. .

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. If we can reach that agreement, that will he satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, let us be perfectly frank about it. The Alaska bill is before the House as a House bill. It comes up again on Wednesday next. The Senate has passed an Alaska bill, which has been referred to the Committee on Territories and reported back to the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Houston], as I understand, expected to move to suspend the rules and make it in order to take up the Senate bill in place of the House bill, upon the same conditions under which the House bill is being considered. I do not know how it strikes the rest of the House, but it seems to me that that request ought to be granted. Otherwise we will have the House and the Senate working to no advantage, and my desire is to find out whether it would be practicable to agree by unanimous consent to dispose of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, which, of course, can be disposed of, if some gentleman desires to object, in five minutes, and then give the gentleman from Tennessee the right to make his motion, after which we could take up the immigration bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I will say, in response to the gentleman from Illinois, that I do not believe we can get unanimous consent to that effect, knowing somewhat the attitude of some gentlemen with respect to the consideration of the Alaska bill. I am trying to facilitate the bill in the House. That is to say, I think within the hour or hour and a half left before 2 o'clock, with only 12 bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, we can dispose of them. That would save the hour and a half of discussion on the point of order as to whether or not the gentleman from Alabama is correct in his position.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was seeking to ascertain if it would be practicable in the unanimous-consent agreement to authorize the gentleman from Tennessee to make his motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. GARNER. I do not believe that the gentleman could obtain that unanimous consent, from remarks that I hear on this side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is practicable, from information in my possission.

Mr. GARNER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will submit my request for unanimous consent that until the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. we can consider the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and that at that time, or sooner, if we dispose of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, the House automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the immigration bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will grant us a little more time than that. I think we ought to have until at least 3 o'clock.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] must realize that in case the House desires to dispose of this calendar quickly it can do so. There is no man on the floor to-day who is going to object to a bill on this calendar who does not know at this time that he is going to object to it. We usually take from 30 to 40 minutes on a bill merely to reply to some inquiry. I believe that we can get through this in an hour and a half; but, in order to satisfy other gentlemen, I will ask that the time be set at half past 2 o'clock.

Mr. BURNETT. I would agree to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think this parliamentary question ought to be disposed of now. tion taken by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnett], I | It will not take any longer to dispose of it now than it would at some other time, and I am disposed to object to anything except

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York will permit, a decision of the parliamentary situation to-day, if it was a final decision of the question, might be desirable to have, but the decision to-day depends probably upon the wording of a special rule which might possibly never come before the House again in those words. I do not think it is as desirable to have the ruling as it would be upon a question which covered what might be a precedent hereafter.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest to the gentleman that if there was a decision by the Chair in regard to this rule and the decision was settled, then the Committee on Rules when coming in with other special rules could take that into sonsideration, and the House might know when voting on a special rule just how far it was going, whether it was destroy-ing the other rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object,
I wish to state that I am of the opinion that the Unanimous Consent Calendar has preference over this bill, but realizing the fact that that would be disposed of by objection within 10 or 15 minutes, I do not care to object that the matter should go on until about 2.30 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent that the time from now until half past 2 be devoted to the Unanimous Consent Calendar, provided the Unanimous Consent Calendar requires that much time, and that when that is exhausted, or when 2.30 arrives, that the House shall automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the immigration bill. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. Mr. FITZGERALD. If that agreement be made by the House, what is the understanding-that motions to suspend the rules would not be recognized by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Under the gentleman's request—Mr. MANN. Well, that would depend.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We want to know.

Mr. MANN. The committee might rise at any time, at which time a motion to suspend the rules would be in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If we are to consider the immigration bill under such conditions, we ought to know it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that at least half a dozen Members, maybe more, have indicated their desire to be heard on the point of order as to whether this bill cuts out the business assigned under the general rule to this day or not, and if that question is going to be argued later under this request of the gentleman from Texas it might as well be done now as at any other time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps the Chair did not understand

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to ask this question: That at the end of this request of the gentleman from Texas, whether it would be competent to make motions to suspend the rules? Well, now, that is the very question of parliamentary law that is raised by half a dozen gentlemen.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But that can be settled if the Speaker feels this agreement will be binding upon him and will not recognize anybody to move to suspend the rules. Under that condition there will be no trouble.

The SPEAKER. No; if any gentleman should ask unanimous consent to substitute to-morrow for to-day-

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall object to that.

The SPEAKER. Well, if the same question is going to arise when we get through with Mr. Garner's request, it might as well be settled now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, my purpose is to ascertain whether if this request be granted and the Unanimous Consent whether the Speaker feels in Calendar is taken out of the way, whether the Speaker feels, in view of the agreement, that he should not recognize motions to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Why, it would be persuasive to the conclusion that the Speaker ought not to do it to-day, although the Chair is not settling that thing definitely, but he wanted the House to understand what it was doing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wanted to know, too, because an entirely different question arises once the Unanimous Consent Calendar is out of the way.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I make this request, and I think I can clear up this matter. I would ask to change the request in one particular, and that is that until 2.30 to-day the business of to-day shall be in order under the rules and at that time the House automatically resolve itself into the Committee | of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the immigration bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has already given notice that he would object to that.

The SPEAKER. No—

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I asked the Speaker whether if that agreement were made the Speaker would feel called upon not to recognize motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. GARNER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from New York did not say he would object to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was trying to find out the attitude of the Speaker. I think it is not unfair to endeavor to find out what the situation is—

Mr. MANN. Pretty soon 2.30 will be here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The determination of the question whether the immigration bill has the right of way depends on this Unanimous Consent Calendar.

If the Unanimous Consent Calendar be out of the way, this being suspension day, a motion to suspend the rules would suspend this special order as well as any other rule. The motion to suspend the rules could not be made until the Unanimous Consent Calendar was out of the way. It is fair that the House shall know whether the Speaker would feel disposed to recognize motions to suspend the rules if the Unanimous Consent Calendar were taken out of the way by this agreement. Of course it might affect Members in their action in objecting or in refraining from objecting to the agreement,

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands that the Unanimous Consent Calendar is the calendar of committees under the rule. Usually on this side we have been in favor of maintaining the integrity of the Committee Discharge Calendar, while you are trying to evade the rules.

The SPEAKER. The question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] raises precisely the same matter at 2.30 p. m., provided the request is granted, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick] raised in the beginning.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not, Mr. Speaker, because with the Unanimous Consent Calendar, if that be the order of business, the Speaker has no discretion. If the Speaker were to hold that the Unanimous Consent Calendar must be called, he can not interfere with it, but after it is disposed of motions to suspend the rules would be in order; but if he were to hold that the special order took precedence, no motion to suspend the rules could be entertained. But if the Unanimous Consent Calendar were out of the way, the question of recognition for suspension is wholly within the discretion of the Speaker. It is not a matter of right to any Member, and that part of it depends on what the attitude of the Speaker is toward such motions.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is aware that there is an extant ruling to the effect that a motion to suspend the rules is not in order during consideration of a bill under the special order, so there might be a difference between the question of suspension of rules and the question of the Unanimous Consent Calendar in view of that decision.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. Firz-GERALD] yield?
Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. MANN. The unanimous-consent request submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was that at 2.30 p. m. the House would automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the immigration bill. That unanimous-consent request, if agreed to, would prevent anything under the suspension of the rules, and doubtless, if reached before that time, would require the House to go into the Committee of the Whole

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] is correct. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent Unanimous Consent Calendar be considered until 2.30 o'clock p. m., if it takes that much time, and when it is exhausted or 2.30 o'clock p. m. arrives, that the House will automatically resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the special order.

Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will call the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

PATENTS TO TRANSFEREES OF TOWN LOTS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4938) providing for the issuance of patents to transferees of town lots purchased from the United States at public sales in certain cases.

The bill was read in full.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object-Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill remain on the calendar without prejudice. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

SALE OF LAND TO CITY OF LAWTON, OKLA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10258) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Lawton, Okla., a tract of land to be used for watershed and water-supply purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, ctc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell to the city of Lawton, Okla., and issue appropriate conveyance therefor at any time within six months from and after the passage and approval of this act, for the sum of $1.25 per acre, the following-described tracts of land: The west half section 1 and all of section 2, township 3 north, range 13 west, the same to be used by the city of Lawton as a part of the watershed and water supply: Provided, That in the event the lands above described cease to be needed or used for the purposes above mentioned, the same shall revert to the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "half," insert the word "of."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, should not this bill be considered in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that. We are having these amendments read for the information of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, yes. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the other amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 10, after the word "Lawton," insert the word "solely," In line 1, page 2, after the word "supply," insert the words "for said city and other public uses."

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman make a statement concerning it.

Mr. FERRIS. This bill authorizes the sale of six quarters of land on the edge of the Wichita Mountains for the use of the city of Lawton for water-drainage purposes. It is worthless, gravelly, thin land, and it is about 25 miles from the town. The enactment of this bill is recommended in the strongest kind of terms by the department. The land is needed in connection with the water supply. The city in which I live has gone to the almost marvelous expense of building a $250,000 dam, and they have bonded themselves and almost "busted" themselves in building the dam. They need this additional land to protect their drainage area.

Mr. COOPER. What is the meaning of the words "for said city and other public uses"

Mr. FERRIS. The Fort Sill Military Reservation gets water from our dam, and the Government Indian school also gets water from the dam. They are going to get water from it up to the 30-foot level.

Mr. COOPER. I do not know what the exact provisions are, but that would permit the sale of water for the development of electric power, would it not?

Mr. FERRIS. There is no power there. This dam merely collects the surface water and water from the little springs.

Mr. COOPER. Is it a dam without its having the possi-bilities of power development?

Mr. FERRIS. There is no big stream there. It is merely surface water coming down from the mountains. I do not care particularly about that, except for the fact that the Government has been glad to get water from there for the Indian school and for the fort. That is the reason this insertion is made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman how much this land is worth per acre?

Mr. FERRIS. The report of the department says it is thin, gravely, poor land. I am acquainted with it myself. It is about 25 miles from any town or railroad. The facts are as stated in the report. The Printing Office has printed the letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior in large type, but that is the letter of the department. It is signed by one of the department officials. It should have been printed in fine

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is stated in the report that the Reclamation Service contemplates enlarging the dam that has been erected by the city of Lawton.

Mr. FERRIS. There is some talk of that, I will say to the gentleman.

I will be glad to state fully what is going on in that regard. The city has been informed by the engineers of the department that all they need is water up to the 30-foot level. Above the 30-foot level and up to 50 feet they are asked to turn over the water to the Reclamation Service, so that it can use the water for irrigation purposes. The water below the 30-foot level is to be used by the Fort Sill Military Reservation for a nominal consideration and by the Indian school without charge.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that we have made quite a large appropriation for the purpose of building an Indian hospital on this reservation?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The question I desire to ask the gentleman is this: Will this furnish water to this hospital?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; it will; and in ample supply; and as the building of the hospital will be an adjunct of the school, it will be supplied with the school.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Should there not be a provision of law providing that the water shall be furnished to the Indian school by the city of Lawton free of charge?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not want to offer an amendment of that kind. The city has already expended about a quarter of a million dollars in securing this water supply by means of the dam, and they only ask the right to buy some outlying land for drainage purposes; and while this is being done as a voluntary proposition, I do not think that provision ought to be incorporated in the law. I do not think the gentleman would want it. The city has bonded itself, and the fact that it wants to pay the Government a price for a piece of land 25 miles from a railroad would make it unfair out of all proportion to insert any provision of that kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The acquisition of this land is said to be important to protect the water supply both of the Indian reservation and the military reservation, and it is pointed to as an argument for the passage of this bill that the water is furnished to the military post for a nominal consideration and to the Indian school free of charge. Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not protect the Government in its rights by putting in this bill a provision that water shall be furnished to the military reservation and to the Indian school free of charge, as one of the considerations for this legislation?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman would not want to inject any such provision as that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope not; for the reason that the city has purchased all of the land at its own expense and has built a dam at its own expense, and has gone through with the whole dam at its own expense, and has gone through with the whole project, and acquired all the necessary land save and except these six quarters of rocky, gravelly land. The gentleman would not want to inject a proposition of that kind into the law. The city could not afford to comply with it. This is a city of less than 10,000 inhabitants, and they have almost bankrupted themselves to build this dam. It is a most amazing thing that the people of that city should, at their own expense, go out and buy land and build this enormous dam. It is an instance of municipal generosity which is almost without a parallel in the history of Government institutions.

Now, we want to buy some land which is practically worthless for any other purpose to complete our drainage area. The gentleman does not want to inject any proposition of the kind that he suggests, because, of course, that would kill the bill. could not afford to submit to anything of that kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not?

Mr. FERRIS. Because it would be totally unjust.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why would it be unjust? It is being done now.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman had spent $1,000,000 on a project and needed to buy $5 worth of land, it would be utterly unjust for me to step in and compel the gentleman to agree to assume a burden which was out of all proportion to the value of the land which he wished to purchase.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. It would be out of all proportion to compel them to do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have very serious doubts as to whether this bill should pass without containing that provision. The First Assistant Secretary of the Interior points out that-

This system supplies palatable and healthful water not only to the inhabitants of Lawton but to Fort Sill military post, which has been recently enlarged, and the Indian school maintained by the Government. Water is furnished to the military post for a nominal consideration and to the Indian school free of charge.

Why not protect the Government—
Mr. FERRIS. What right would you have to take my property to protect the Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. You are asking for something. We are not asking for anything.

Mr. FERRIS. We are asking to buy this land.
Mr. FITZGERALD. You are asking to buy land which is necessary in order to complete this project, and asking to obtain the land from the Government at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. FERRIS. That is about all it is worth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this Medicine Bluff, Creek is to be further utilized by being dammed for reclamation or irrigation purposes, the land which you desire to buy is essential as a part of the project. The gentleman is asking that the Government sell the land at a nominal price, according to the report of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. If the Government is to sell this land at a nominal price to the city of Lawton, why should not the city of Lawton agree to continue to furnish water to the military post and to the Indian school, both of which institutions are for the benefit of Oklahoma, at a nominal

Mr. FERRIS. Because the city could not afford to accept any such onerous proposition as that as a mandatory proposition, after it has already expended a million of dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it is doing it now.

Mr. FERRIS. They want to buy a little remnant of land, merely, to complete their drainage area. The gentleman has idea of fairness; and when a little town of less than 10,000 people has spent a sum so enormous, the gentleman does not want to impose on them a burden which they can not afford, simply because they want to buy a small area of land to complete the drainage area.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not propose to impose on the beople anything which they are not doing at the present time.

They are furnishing this water now free.

Mr. FERRIS. To the school.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And at a nominal price to the military

Mr. FERRIS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not provide that they shall continue to furnish water free to the school and at a nominal price to the military post?

Mr. FERRIS. For the same reason that I ought not to go and claim some of the gentleman's private property because it became necessary for him to buy a right of way across a little piece of land,

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is what the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior said-

Mr. FERRIS. I remember what he says.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall put it into the RECORD:

I am clearly of the opinion that the proposed grant, for a nominal price, should be made. It is obvious that the benefit thus to be secured to the Indians would outweigh the small sum that might accrue to them through a sale of the land under the act of June 30, 1913.

Mr. FERRIS. That statement is a little wrong, for the reason that the Indians parted with every vestige of title they had, in 1901, when they signed the treaty. I presume the gentleman was a Member of Congress at that time.

This is Government land-poor land-lying up on the edge of the mountain 25 miles from the town, and the city would like to buy it to increase their drainage area and keep the water from being polluted by cattle being pastured on it. The legislature has passed an act to enable them to do it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is no doubt but that the title has passed from the Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it affects very vitally the Indian

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the committee amendments, as follows: Amend by inserting the word "of" after the word "half" and before the word "section" in line 8 of the bill; and further amend by inserting the word "solely" after the word "Lawton" and before the word "as" in line 10 of the bill; and furthur amend by inserting "for said city and other public uses" after the word "supply" and before the semicolon in line 10 of the bill.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ACTION FOR DEATH ON THE HIGH SEAS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6143) relating to the maintenance of action for death on the high seas and other navigable waters.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from New Jersey will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have objected heretofore to the bill, and now I want to be permitted to put my views in regard to the bill in the RECORD as an extension of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the reason or excuse for the enactment of the pending bill is that there is no Federal statute authorizing recovery for death due to negligence on the high seas. I think, however, the real purpose of this bill and the real effect of the bill would not be to supply a remedy to the dependents for loss of life at all, but would merely create a new and exclusive jurisdiction wherein such cases could be tried.

So at the outset let us consider the general scope and effect of the bill to determine, first, what additional remedy it will supply, if any, to those who are damaged by the loss of dependents at sea; second, what innovations will it introduce as to procedure.

As to the first matter, the proponents of this bill say we have no Federal statute for loss by death at sea and that this bill will provide such a statute. They say England had no such law till the Lord Campbell act. That is true. The following is a copy of Lord Campbell's act enacted August 26, 1846:

with provide such a statute. They say England had no such law till the Lord Campbell's act emacted August 26, 1846:

An act for compensating the families of persons killed by accidents (26th Aug., 1846).

Whereas no action at law is now maintainable against a person who, by his wrongful act, neglect, or default, may have caused the death of another person, and it is oftentimes right and expedient that the wrongdoer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injury so caused by him: Be it therefore Enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable, if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

II. And be it enacted that every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person so deceased; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the beforementioned parties in such shares a sthe jury by their verdict shall find and direct.

III. Provided always, and be it enacted, that not more than one action shall lie for and in resp

vII. And be it enacted that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of Parliament.

Since enactment this act has been amended so as to make it accord with modern civilized thought. For instance, it was amended so that insurance carried and received by the dependents of a deceased person could not be deducted from the amount of damages, and other amendments have made this law accord with modern thought. Note the title of Lord Campbell's act, "An act for compensating the families of persons killed by accident." There is not a word in this act about loss of life at sea. Yet it has effect on English vessels, and only on English vessels, at home or at sea, because a vessel floating the English flag at sea is construed by the law of nations to be in the situation of a floating island under British authority. The laws of England follow the flag when at sea, and may be applied, in so far as they confer rights upon individuals, by the courts of any nation when that court has acquired jurisdiction of the parties in an action in personam, or of the rem if the action be one in rem.

WE CAN LEGISLATE ONLY FOR AMERICAN SHIPS AND AMERICAN WATERS.

It will be seen that this Congress can not pass any law for English ships while not in American waters. The title of this act would better read: "An act relating to the maintenance of actions for death on American vessels on the high seas and on all vessels on American navigable waters."

That this Congress can not go further than that is in part at issue in the Titanic case, now before the United States Supreme Court. But the question has often been passed on in State and Federal courts

Chief Justice Marshall, in United States v. Palmer (3 Wheat., 643), interpreting a general statute against piracy on the high

The crime of robbery committed by a person on the high seas on board of any ship or vessel belonging exclusively to subjects of a foreign State is no piracy within the true intent and meaning of the act entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and is not punishable in the courts of the United States.

It might be suggested that any layman would know that this Congress can not pass laws governing the conduct of seamen or others on foreign ships sailing in the Mediterranean Sea or elsewhere out of the jurisdiction of our flag.

I will cite a civil suit involving property rights and liability t sea. In Lindstrom v. International Navigation Co. (123 Fed., 475) Judge Wallace, speaking for the circuit court, says:

The territorial sovereignty of a State extends to a vessel of the State when it is upon the high seas, the vessel being deemed a part of the territory of the State to which it belongs; and it follows that a State statute which creates a liability or authorizes a recovery for the consequences of a tortious act operates as efficiently upon the vessel of a State when it is beyond its boundaries as it does when it is physically within the State.

Other authorities are the Hamilton (207 U. S., 398), La Bourgogne (210 U. S., 95, 138), the E. B. Ward (17 Fed., 456), the Jane Gray (95 Fed., 693).

For text-book authorities I cite Wharton on Conflict of Laws

A ship in the open sea is regarded by the law of nations as part of the territory whose flag such ship carries * * *. In respect to principle, ships at sea and the property in them must be viewed as a part of the country to which they belong.

Minor, an accurate and eminent text writer in Conflict of Laws, section 195, says:

In cases of tort committed on the high seas, the tort must be regarded as committed in the territory of the State or country to which the vessel belongs. The law of the flag is the lex loci delicti.

Of course, it follows that we can not pass laws for German or French or Italian or Japanese vessels on the high seas. European nations have the death-liability law, anyway, and the English law is a much better one than that which is here proposed. This is a weak, puerile statute that should not be considered for a moment.

We have seen that we can legislate only for American ships on the high seas. But every American ship is necessarily registered at some American port, and every American port is part of some American State, and every American State has already enacted a law much better than the Lord Campbell Act. No State has any such limping, feeble statute as that proposed in the pending bill. Of course, a Federal statute would promote uniformity of law as between the States by wiping out the State statutes and would establish one Federal law for the sea and State laws for the land; but what the necessity for uniformity at sea any more than on land among the States? There is none, or at least very little.

WOULD ABRIDGE THE RIGHT OF JURY TRIAL.

Now, let us take up the second question stated. What innovation would this bill introduce as to procedure? It would provide for trial of these damage cases by an admiralty judge in- | Federal law conflicts. If we enact this bill into law, it will stead of by jury. A suit for death on an English ship would not come up exclusively before an admiralty judge-there a jury would pass on these matters.

In the Times Law Reports, Friday, July 11, 1913, reporting an English case of O'Brien against The Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.), being one of four actions brought to recover damages for the death of persons drowned while passengers on the Titanic, the jury found there had been no negligence in the navigation of the ship, so far as the keeping of the lookout was concerned, but that there had been negligence as regards the speed at which the vessel was traveling at the time of the disaster.

This case will be found reported in volume 20, page 629, Times Law Reports. While I have not had opportunity to go to any great length at investigation of English cases, it will be seen from this case that the question of negligence by the shipowner was a fact which was determined by a jury.

I will have more to say as to the abolishing of jury trial later in discussing the limiting-liability statute of the United States and the way it works in the case of the loss of the Titanic.

This bill if enacted into law would not only destroy the right of trial by jury, but would, when used in conjunction with the limiting-liability statutes, compel litigants to try their cases in the forum selected by the shipowner and would entail great expense and long journeys in many cases.

It would deprive State courts and judges elected by the people of jurisdiction and transfer that jurisdiction to Federal judges, who sit, by appointment, for life.

Claimants could not employ lawyers whom they knew, in many instances, but would have to refer their case to lawyers in some distant city where the admiralty court selected by the shipowner was domiciled,

This bill if enacted into law would not be complete in itself and would have to be considered together with other general maritime law, because of the ancient wording of the last portion of the first section. Section 1 reads as follows:

That whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default occurring on the high seas, the Great Lakes, or any navigable waters of the United States the personal representative of the decedent may maintain a suit for damages in the district courts of the United States in admiralty for the exclusive benefit of the decedent's wife, husband, parent, child, or dependent relatives against the vessel, person, or corporation which would have been liable to a suit for damages by or in behalf of the decedent by reason of such act if death had not ensued.

Suppose, for instance, after this act has become law, a man is badly burned at sea on a vessel registered at San Francisco by the bursting of a steam pipe due to the negligence of the shipowner. If he lives, he has a right to sue for the injury in the State court before a California judge, who, by the way, is subject to recall. Suppose he dies; then his case goes to the Federal court, unless he has been induced to accept a settlement which has been entered of record in court before he died. In such case the heirs or dependents are robbed by the proviso at the end of the last section of the bill:

Provided, That there shall be but one recovery by the person injured or by or in behalf of any of the persons mentioned in section 1.

The bill has nothing to do with injuries less than death, except here where it provides for a settlement before death to rob the widow and children after death. These settlements or agreements are specially outlawed in the American employers' liability act.

But let us suppose that he died without a "recovery before death" and his widow sues. His widow must set up and prove that if he had not died he would have had a cause of action. Surely it is plain to my colleagues that we do not want to enact such a provision as that into law. If we are going to give the right to recover damages in case of death, let us say so in plain words, such as are used in the employers' liability act.

COMPLICATIONS UNDER WASHINGTON STATE STATUTE.

This if-death-had-not-ensued contingency might bring on all sorts of complications if the death occurred anywhere in the world on a vessel registered at any port in the State of Washington or if the death or accident causing death occurred on any American or foreign vessel while in the State of Washington. I will not discuss the application to a foreign vessel while in the State of Washington now, but in the case of Washington boats, whether in the State or on the high seas, the employees have no cause of action for any injury less than death, nor do the dependents have any cause of action where death ensues. My State of Washington is the only State, I understand, that has an industrial insurance act that includes steamboats under its provisions. Of course a Washington boat is subject to Washington law on the high seas as well as in State waters, unless provide an exclusive remedy for death on the high seas. Washington law will then lose jurisdiction on Washington boats on this particular subject matter the minute a boat clears Dungeness Spit in the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

After clearing this point on a Washington boat a man is badly burned, from the effects of which he later dies. The accident having occurred on the "high seas," he must turn to a Federal judge. It would be Judge Cornelius H. Hanford if the people out there had not raised such objections to him that Congress sent the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCov] who has charge of this bill out there with two other members of the Judiciary Committee to investigate him, and when the investigation got hot he resigned. The first thing the attorney—no; he would have to be a proctor—would have to allege for the widow of this man in his complaint would be that the plaintiff would have had a right to sue if he had not died from the injury, as is provided in the first section of this act.

The proctor in admiralty employed by the steamboat owner would deny that the deceased would have had a right to sue if he had lived, and would present, to substantiate his allegation, section 1 of chapter 74 of the session laws of 1911, as follows:

DECLARATION OF POLICE POWER.

SECTION 1. The common-law system governing the remedy of workmen against employers for injuries received in hazardous work is inconsistent with modern industrial conditions. In practice it proves to be economically unwise and unfair. Its administration has produced the result that little of the cost of the employer has reached the workman and that little only at large expense to the public. The remedy of the workman has been uncertain, slow, and inadequate. Injuries in such works, formerly occasional, have become frequent and inevitable. The welfare of its wageworker. The State of Washington, therefore, exercising herein its police and sovereign power, declares that all phases of the premises are withdrawn from probate controversy, and sure and certain relief for workmen injured in extra-hazardous work and their families and dependents is hereby provided regardless of questions of fault and to the exclusion of every other remedy, proceeding, or compensation, except as otherwise provided in this act; and to that end all civil actions and civil causes of action for such personal injuries and all jurisdiction of the courts of the State over such causes are hereby abolished, except as entering 2 and show that steemboats.

He would then refer to section 2 and show that steamboats are included as involving hazardous employment, and that men working on Washington steamboats have no right to sue for any kind of personal injuries. With this act prohibiting this widow from going to any other court than admiralty, and the steamboat owner having the right, and in fact being compelled under the Federal act, to abide by the admiralty court, could the widow get any relief?

AN ANCIENT AND MUSTY STATUTE.

The truth about this bill is that it is about 50 years behind statute-Lord Campbell's-which was enacted 68 years ago. Why hang on to ideas and forms used before any of us were born? I ask the gentleman why this act was not patterned after the employers' liability act? That is modern, that is up to date. It covers the land and provides for loss by death through neglect of common carriers by railroad. There is no reason why the same modern and humane principles should not be applied to

Before leaving section 1 of this bill I desire to direct the attention of Congress to two more features designed to help out the shipowner and make it harder to recover. One of these is the use of the word "exclusive." This word is not in Lord Campbell's act and not in the employers' liability act. Some admiralty lawyer—proctor in admiralty, I should say—put it there thinking it might help a little. He knew it could not possibly help the claimant, so he put in the word.

The use of this word and several others confirm what is said of the bill by Mr. Fitz-Henry Smith, jr., in the committee report:

The bill was drafted by a committee of the Maritime Law Association of the United States, an association which is composed of judges of the Federal courts and many of the leading maritime lawyers of the country. It was submitted to all the members of the association for criticism, and was adopted at the last annual meeting only after the most thorough consideration. Its passage is carnestly advocated by both the Maritime Law Association and the American Bar Association.

The other feature of section 1 of the bill designed to make recovery before the admiralty judge a little harder, if possible, is the provisions defining or naming those who have the right of recovery in case of death.

Lord Campbell's act-see sections 2 and 5-give the right of recovery to wife, husband, parents, child, grandfather, grandmother, stepfather, stepmother, son, daughter, grandson, granddaughter, stepson, and stepdaughter.

The employers' liability act gives the right of recovery to the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and if none, then of such employee's parents; and if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee.

The workman's compensation act of the State of Washington provides that in case of death the award shall go to the widow, widower, or child under the age of 16 years, invalid child over the age of 16 years, daughter under 18 years of age, father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, stepfather, stepmother, grandson, granddaughter, stepson, stepdaughter, brother, sister, half sister, half brother, niece, nephew, who at the time of the accident are dependent, in whole or in part, for their support on the earnings of the workman, except where otherwise provided by treaty; aliens, other than father and mother, not residing within the United States at the time of the accident are not excluded.

Now, let us see the provision of the pending bill "drafted by eminent judges and the leading maritime lawyers of the coun--also indorsed by the American Bar Association with no less distinguished a president than William H. Taft, former President of the United States, and also approved by the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee of the Congress of the United States of America.

Under the pending bill, listen to the legal phraseology and the profound words of wisdom:

That whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default occurring on the high seas, the Great Lakes, or any navigable waters of the United States, the personal representative of the decedent may maintain a suit for damages in the district court of the United States in admiralty for the exclusive benefit of the decedent's wife, husband, parent, child, or dependent relatives against the vessel, person, or corporation which would have been liable to a suit for damages by or in behalf of the decedent by reason of such act if death had not ensued.

What does it mean? Here a proctor in admiralty, he will tell you, after he has gone through his library of admiralty law, considered it in connection with the State law, and weighed it all out thoroughly.

YOUNG KUEHNE, "MONROE"-" NANTUCKET" HERO.

Let us apply the remarkable composition to the parents of young Ferdinand J. Kuehne, the hero of the Monroe-Nantucket disaster off the Virginia Capes last Saturday morning, "He died as a hero should."

Those are the words of the gray-haired parents, as they sit yonder in their little cottage in the Bronx, with aching hearts, bereaved and saddened by the loss of their boy and their support in the trying scenes of old age that are coming upon them. "We wouldn't have him otherwise," they said Saturday. "We wouldn't have had him fail in the test. He was brave, our boy. It is just like him. But it is hard to lose him like this."

For years, ever since he grew old enough to earn money of his own, young Kuehne was the principal support of his parents. He was the only son, and they had become more and more dependent on him.

He is the hero of the wreck, because he stayed at his post while the captain was hopping into the first lifeboat that was launched. He knew he could not swim and that the boat would go to the bottom in a few minutes, but he unbuckled his life preserver and adjusted it about the waist of a young woman whom he had never seen before. He could see light and glory in the path of duty, even though it did lead to death.

But what about his aged parents recovering under this bill? Considering for the present this first section only, these parents having consulted a proctor in admiralty, the proctor would reason about like this: "These parents of young Kuehne have a right of action against some rem or some personam if Kuehne would have had a right of action if he had not died as a result of the act of the owner of the vessel which he is to sue. In order to determine if young Kuehne would have had a right of action if he had not died, I must give due consideration to State law, where all questions of damages from acts which do not result in death may be subject to legislation. I must consider the doctrine of assumption of risk; if he assumed the risk, if he was fully warned by the facts of the danger of his position, he can not recover. Then, did he do what he did through the fault of a fellow servant, and was he negligent; did he use due diligence to save himself; and, then, did the boat captain use due diligence; was the accident due to the wrongful act, neglect, or default of the boat owner or the boat's officers?"

What would you give for the chances of these parents to receive any part of that which society has appropriated, absorbed, and taken away from them?

I have not gone into any of the other sections of this bill that these big steamship lawyers want us to rush through this Congress quickly without debate. Every remaining section is as full of jokers and jokerettes as the American Bar Association is full of lawyers. The whole statute is a voice from the tomb of the ages past. It does not partake of the ideas of this day. There is no sympathy in it. It contains none of the milk of human kindness. It is written to save dollars, not to do Look here at section 2. There are two features to the section, and each of them is abominable:

Sec. 2. That the recovery in such suit shall be a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary loss sustained to the persons for whose benefit the suit is brought and shall be apportioned among them by the court in proportion to the damage they may severally have suffered by reason of the death of the person by whose representative the suit is brought.

"Pecuniary loss" to be determined by a stranger, a Federal judge on the bench for life—no jury—and the amount of the recovery shall be apportioned by this Federal judge. He may be a good and honorable man-and I know that most Federal judges are both good and honorable-but who wants to give away the constitutional right of trial by jury at the behest of the American Maritime Association and the American Bar Association, even if this Judiciary Committee of the House does report the bill for passage? I doubt if a member of the committee studied the bill, and none of them gave the matter adequate consideration.

The third section of the bill as proposed by these eminent lawyers and judges fixed one year for the commencement of the suit and provided that action would be barred by the statute of limitations if not begun in that time. The law would allow the company three years in which to sue one of its employees for a dollar he owed the owner on account of board, but one year only for the employee's dependents to sue for death. The committee has recommended that this time be increased from one to two years, Of course, this is a substantial improvement.

Section 5 keeps alive the doctrine of comparative negligence.

It charges up to the widow and the orphan the least act of negligence on the part of the deceased which led to the accident. I say the entire loss should be charged up to society. to the particular industry, and the widow and the orphan and other dependents should be paid in full.

SECTION 6 PRESERVES A DISGRACEFUL STATUTE.

While Congress has failed to pass laws to remunerate the widow and orphan except as to accidents by common carriers by railroad, it has not failed to pass laws of general maritime jurisdiction limiting the liability of shipowners. These were passed to "save our rapidly disappearing merchant marine." The act of 1851 was the original liability statute. In 1884 it was amended, and in 1886 its benefits were extended to the shipowners on the Great Lakes and to every river, bayou, or lake in the country. Of course, this extension, whatever consideration may be indulged in as to the original act, was not to preserve the flag on the ocean or the lakes, since there was chance to compete with foreign nations on the lakes or rivers, but to prevent seamen, passengers, and shippers from getting adequate damages for losses and injuries, and survivors from obtaining adequate damages for lives lost on vessels, which were amply provided for in the State courts. So far as lake and inland traffic was concerned, this statute by Congress was a Federal invention intended solely to save dollars to shipowners at the expense of shippers, employees, and passengers.

In 1851, when Senator Hamlin, of Maine, put the bill through the Senate of the United States, he stated in the debates that it was predicated on the English law, and that "it places our commercial marine on the same basis as that of England."

But this statute which still stands on our books and by this inexplicable act of marine benevolence has been extended to the Great Lakes and inland waters is to-day far more liberal to shipowners than is the British statute for limiting liability. State courts when attempting to collect damages for death and other injuries from shipowners have to meet that statute and stand for its limitations

It is an unconscionable statute, and the fact that it is on our statute books ought to strike shame into the hearts of these men who now appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee and propose this bill, which is of very little use, if any, without suggesting the repeal of this liability statute at least in so far as personal injuries, whether resulting in death or not, are con-cerned. It is worthy of note that Senator Hamlin put this original liability bill through on March 3, 1851, making it one of those last-moment acts rushed through without adequate consideration. The important features of the act as passed and as it stands to-day without amendment, although extended to the Great Lakes and inland waters, are known as sections 4283, 4284, and 4285 of the Revised Statutes, and read as follows:

SEC. 4283. The liability of the owner of any vessel for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction by any person of any property, goods, or merchandise shipped or put on board of such vessel, or for any loss, damage, or lajury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing lost, damaged, or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending.

SEC 4284. Whenever any such embezzlement, loss, or destruction is suffered by several freighters or owners of goods, wares, merchandise, or any property whatever on the same voyage, and the whole value of the vessel and her freight for the voyage is not sufficient to make compensation to each of them they shall receive compensation from the owner of the vessel in proportion to their respective losses, and for that purpose the freighters and owners of the property and the owner of the vessel, or any of them, may take the appropriate proceedings in any court for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which the owner of the vessel may be liable among the parties entitled thereto.

SEC 4285, It shall be deemed a sufficient compliance on the part of such owner, with the requirements of this title relating to his liability for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction of any property, goods, or merchandise, if he shall transfer his interest in such vessel and freight, for the benefit of such claimants, to a trustee, to be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction, to act as such trustee for the person who may prove to be legally entitled thereto, from and after which transfer all claims and proceedings against the owner shall cease.

Rules 54 and 56 in admiralty, prescribed by an honorable Federal judge for life, do about as much enacting as does the original statute, for these rules provide that when a shipowner shall file suit to limit liability under this act in admiralty court the judge of such court may issue a restraining order enjoining suit being commenced in any other court than that particular one by any other claimant. This, of course, enables the ship-owner to pick his judge and then compel all claimants to bring their claims to the forum thus selected and abide the decrees or await the delays of this particular judge, including all delays of appeal to higher courts touching the question of limiting liability. By this injunction process this Federal judge in admiralty is enabled to supersede State courts and other judicial forums wherein claimants may have preferred to file their claims. And the liability decree of the admiralty court is binding on all parties. Here is the way the court rules, supplements, augments and adds to the congressional statute matter which no doubt Congress would have refused to enact, notwithstanding the rush of a last-day seance of emergency and unanimous-consent legislation:

when any ship or vessel shall be libeled or the owner or owners thereof shall be sued ——, and he or they shall desire to claim the benefit of limitations of liability provided for in sections 3 and 4 of the act of March 3, 1851, ——, the said owner or owners shall and may file a libel or petition in the proper district court of the United States —— praying proper relief in that behalf; and thereupon said court, having caused due appraisement to be had of the amount or value of the interest of said owner or owners, respectively, in such ship or vessel and her freight for the voyage, shall make an order for the payment of the same into court, or for the giving of a stipulation, with sureties, for payment thereof, into court whenever the same shall be ordered; or, if the said owner or owners shall so elect, the said court shall, without such appraisement, make an order for the transfer by him or them of his or their interest in such vessel and freight to a trustee to be appointed by the court under the fourth section of said act; and, upon compliance with such order, the said court shall issue a monition against all persons claiming damages for any such embezzlement, loss, destruction, damage, or injury, citing them to appear before the said court and make due proof of their respective claims at or before a certain time to be named in said writ, not less than three months from the issuing of the same; and public notice of such monition shall be given as in other cases, and such further notice served through the post office, or otherwise, as the court in its discretion may direct; and the said court shall also, on the application of the said owner or owners, make an order to restrain the further prosecution of all and any suit or suits against said owner or owners in respect of any such claim or claims.

This court rule affords an illustration of the legislative power

This court rule affords an illustration of the legislative power of a Federal judge. The extraordinary writ of injunction is here conferred by court order to supersede all other State or Federal jurisdiction. Congress would have spurned a statute providing for such an injunction, but an admiralty judge could pass the necessary legislation in his study.

THE "TITANIC" AVOIDS ENGLISH JUSTICE.

The pending cases against the Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.), the White Star Line, for loss of life and property on the Titanic illustrates the injustice both of this limitation of liability statute and the injunction against other suits provided by enactment of the Federal judge.

The incidents connected with the Titanic disaster are fresh in the minds of my colleagues on this floor. The Titanic, a ship of British register, was built in Belfast and launched in 1911 under the ownership and control of the Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.), also known as the White Star Line. On April 10, 1912, the Titanic, with passengers and cargo on board, left Southampton on her maiden voyage, bound for New York. On April 14, at about 11.40 p. m., in midocean, latitude 41 degrees 46 minutes north and longitude 50 degrees 14 minutes west, the ship came into collision with an iceberg, and at 2.20 a. m., on April 15, 1912, she sank, a complete loss, except 14 lifeboats which were saved. Seven hundred and eleven persons of her crew and passenger list were saved and a large number perished, as well as her entire cargo, including freight, baggage, and mails.

In due course a large number of suits and claims were filed against the owners of this vessel in American State courts.

These suits are not filed, however, under American laws, except as to procedure, for the British vessel was subject to English law, which also had advanced far ahead of American jurisprudence and passed a law (Lord Campbell's act) creating such liability.

AN ENGLISH COMPANY DOES LOVE UNITED STATES LAWS, DON'T CHER KNOW.

There is an English liability law governing shipowners, but here, again, even the reputed selfishness of John Bull had not permitted any such liability limitation as Uncle Sam had provided in this rush-me-through-quick-by-unanimous-consent act of Senator Hamlin, of Maine, in 1851. The British act provides a limitation of £15 per ton of ship and cargo. In the case of the Titanic English liability law would render the owners of the vessel liable for an amount aggregating $3,000,000. The American statute would limit the liability to $96,000 plus the value of the Titanic as it now lies at the bottom of the ocean.

The Oceanic Steam & Navigation Co. (Ltd.) had offices in several cities of this country, and relying on the English statute, for the Titanic was an English ship flying the English flag, proceedings had been brought against the owners for damages sustained by reason of the Titanic disaster, as follows

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York: By Louise Robins, as administratrix, and so forth, of George Robins, deceased, for damages for loss of the life of George Robins

In the supreme court, New York County, N. Y.: By Frederick W. Shellard, as administrator, and so forth, of Frederick B. Shellard, deceased, for damages for loss of the life of Frederick B. Shellard,

In the superior court, Cook County, Ill.: By John Devine, as administrator, and so forth, of A. Willard, deceased, for damages for the loss of the life of A. Willard.

In the district court, Ramsey County, Minn.: By Carl Johnson for damages for alleged personal injuries sustained and for loss of baggage. By Oscar Hedman, for damages for alleged personal injuries sustained and for loss of baggage.

ENGLISH DEFENDANTS WANTED TO CHOOSE THE COURT AND NAME THE JUDGE.

Of course, the wise English shipowners did not want these American passengers and employees and their dependents to sue them in these several American courts.

In the first place, they naturally wanted all such cases tried in some court of their own selection, before some judge of their own selection, and, of course, without a jury.

Then, in the second place, they wanted American liability law applied, if possible, so as to let them off on $96,000 liability, rather than English law, with $3,000,000 liability.

Now, I do not suppose there is any Member of Congress here who will blame these English shipowners for wanting these things. But, thanks to this representative Government of ours, this land of the free, this home of the brave, no Congress would ever pass a law that would permit their first want; and as to their second want, court precedents can be relied upon by interpretation of an honorable and learned judiciary to decide that legal matter right; so the litigants can rest in peace. Congress, which alone has the right to legislate, has not lost sight of their rights. Finding no restriction in the laws of Congress as to where he shall sue, one claimant, an administrator, sues for loss of life in the State court of Minnesota, having obtained jurisdiction of the foreign ship-owning corporation under the laws of that State; another in New York and another in Illinois. Here they were within the law, with a forum at home and before a court and under procedure with which they were familiar.

All of a sudden, like a bolt of lightening out of a clear sky, these litigants and all other claimants that can be found, and, of course, the ship-owning company has the whole list, are searched out by a United States marshal, and an order of Federal Judge Holt, of the Southern District of New York, is served upon them, each and every one, and they are commanded to quit suing these English shipowners in any court but that of the said judge. And all who have not yet commenced suit are ordered to "come ye hither unto me and sue before me or otherwise pester ye not that English syndicate."

Amazed they consult their lawyers in Minnesota, in New York, and in Illinois. "Why you are getting me into trouble," each of them says; "you told me I had a right to bring this case here under the law."

THE ATTORNEY FORGOT TO CONSULT THE RULES.

The attorney very correctly insists that he is right and within the law of nations, of the United States, and of the State, but these attorneys failed to take cognizance of the lawmaking power of Federal judges, and upon reference it is found that these litigants must go to the Federal court, many miles away, and await the movements of the procedure which there prevails and put up with the expense and inconvenience because a Federal judge, or perhaps several judges, have prepared a rule which confers this unusual right.

I must pause here to impress upon the attention of Congress the tendency of the Federal judges thus to encroach upon the power of Congress and the legislative branch of this Government. These litigants could stay in the State courts and contest the constitutionality of the statute if Congress had ordered them to go to New York to try the cases, but it is different with this order of Judge Holt, based not on a statute, but on a judgeenacted rule of court.

WITH THE IMPUDENCE OF AN OLIVER TWIST.

An attorney in New York named A. Leonard Brougham, believing that a right to sue in any court of competent jurisdiction and to have a jury trial was a substantial and a vested right of his client which the law and the Constitution protected as it does other rights, disregarded the order not to sue before any judge except this admiralty judge and filed a suit for the representative of a person who had lost her life on the Titanic through the sinking of the ship. Remember, there is no Federal law as to loss of life, and if there were any law it could not affect this English ship. The law of England must be applied in the American court.

The attorney was at once haled into court before the legislative department sitting at the time in "admiralty" and fined $200 for thus starting a suit for his client in the court of his and his client's choice, where he could have a jury trial and stand some chance of having his case tried in a reasonable time.

Mr. Broughman insisted that the injunction was issued without right, and he demanded of the court by what statute or right had it summoned him to answer for contempt. "My rules, right had it summoned him to answer for contempt. "My rules, man; have you not read my rules?" "Ah, Mr. Broughman," says the judge, "you did not look into my rules. It is there provided by my own enactment that I have the right to issue an injunction prohibiting all claimants from suing any shipowner in any court but my own when the shipowner selects me and petitions me to be his tribunal and to limit his liability. True enough, I got my power to limit liability from an act of Congress, which has no application whatever to this English ship, but my power to put all State courts out of business and to supplant juries and be the sole forum whether there be a thousand claims, as in this case, or more, even though not one of them wants me to try his case, is a right I gave myself by my own rules—see rules Nos. 54 and 56. Now, you, sir, have violated my rules. You have not violated the law of the Congress of the United States. No statute forbids the State court in the State of New York to hear your case. There is nothing in the Constitution against it; in fact, your right is protected in your State constitution and in your State law, but my rules, my rules, man, you have violated them, and I fine you $200. I let you off light because it is your first offense."

Mr. Brougham is a fighter, and he appealed the case to the circuit court. He showed to the circuit court that by the decision of Judge Holt himself, which is now on appeal in the United States Supreme Court, Judge Holt had no right at all to proceed under the American liability statute or any American law whatever; yet the circuit court affirmed the contempt order.

INJUNCTION GOOD, BUT NOTHING ELSE WILL HOLD.

I have no doubt the court will hold that the English liability statute prevails in the case of the Titantic, which was at the time of the disaster to all intents and purposes a floating island under English jurisdiction, and that the $3,000,000 liability will be applied. Judge Holt so decided, and the case is now before the United States Supreme Court on appeal. Yet this Federal court by injunction process has acquired jurisdiction over all these cases to the exclusion of State judges and juries

I am opposed to the bill now under consideration because it refers to and perpetuates this outrageous American limitation of liability statute. It should only be referred to to be repealed and abolished. The times do not longer require such a statute, surely not in so far as claims for personal injuries are concerned. For a very reasonable premium liability insurance will carry all such liability.

It is preposterous for a civilized Government to tell the claimants to take the Titanic out there at the bottom of the ocean as the revenues of the voyage. Or, to refer again to the case of the collision between the Monroe and the Nantucket off the Virginia Capes the other day, if it appears "that the Monroe is to blame," to tell these victims to go dive for the hull of the Monroe if they want to find their loss

It would be a parallel case to tell the dependents of a man who was killed by a rifle to go and take the rifle, or by an automobile to go and take the automobile, or in the case of a wrecked train to tell the dependents of the victims to go and take the train.

I will introduce a bill to abolish this absurd liability limitation, and I hope the Judiciary Committee will be prompt and earnest to get that bill on the floor here so it can be passed.

THE HERO OF THE "MONROE" AND "NANTUCKET" DISASTER.

Suppose we return to the hero of the Monroe-Nantucket dis-Under the right of American ships to limit their total liability to the value of the ship and the revenues of the voyage—under those provisions what will the parents of young Kuehne receive? Of course, in this case there is a chance to charge the liability up to the Nantucket if it be held to blame for the wreck, but if the Monroe is to blame, under the benevolence of the American law these aged parents may go to the poorhouse. It would not be so under English law.

The provisions of the statute regulating jurisdiction are, without doubt, conflicting. Sections 1, 7, and 8 establish a joint admiralty jurisdiction with the State over all the navigable admiralty jurisdiction with the State over all the navigable waters of the United States not the high seas, and an exclusive admiralty jurisdiction over the high seas. Then it says the present jurisdiction of the State shall not be abridged. But it is impossible to give exclusive admiralty jurisdiction to the Federal court over the high seas without abridging in part the jurisdiction of every coast State. All of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans are included in the high seas, but the State jurisdiction extends out 2 miles diction extends out 3 miles.

In the State of Washington the high seas extend inside the In the State of Washington the high seas extend inside the Straits of Juan de Fuca to New Dungeness Lighthouse. All that portion of the straits bordering on Clallam County is a part of the high seas, yet it is within State jurisdiction. The boundary of the State of Washington follows the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia, thence south parallel to the shore but 3 miles out to the line of the Columbia River extended.

Our workmen's compensation act applies to all the steam-boats of the State and I am certainly unwilling to help the Government take away from the State any part of its jurisdiction in favor of an admiralty judge. I do not believe the bill would help matters, but that it would do a great injury. I favor repealing the limitation of the liability act. I favor a modern humane employer's liability act for the high seas, but I am opposed to this bill am opposed to this bill.

I have introduced the following bill, which I hope will be promptly reported and passed:

A bill relating to the maintenance of actions for death or injuries on the high seas.

A bill relating to the maintenance of actions for death or injuries on the high seas.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person, firm, or corporation engaged in transporting of passengers or freight by water, or who shall own or operate any vessel or sailing craft on the high seas, Great Lakes, or any navigable water of the United States within the admirality jurisdiction of the United States and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while such person is employed on any such vessel, or is a passenger thereon, or is on or upon any such vessel under any other conditions, or in case of death of any such employee, passenger, or person, to his or her personal representative, for the legal benefit of the surviving widow or husband or children of such person; and if none, then of such employee's parents; and if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such person, firm, or corporation, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its engines, appliances, machinery, works, boats, wharves, or equipment.

Sec. 2. That in all actions hereafter brought against any such person, firm, or corporation under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not be considered.

Sec. 3. That in any action brought against any such person, firm, or corporation under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to or the death of any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment to prevent or limit recovery.

Sec. 4. That any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any such

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge the rights of suitors in the courts of any State or Territory to a remedy given by the laws of any State or Territory in case of injury or death from injury received on the high seas or elsewhere.

SEC. 8. That the personal liability of any shipowner or person sued under this act shall not be subject to any form of limitation on account of the provisions of Congress or general admiralty laws as to limiting liability of shipowners.

APPRAISERS' STORES BUILDING AT MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The next business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5487) to authorize an additional appropriation for the erection of the United States stores building at Milwankee, Wis.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the sum of $75,000 heretofore authorized by the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, being chapter 383 of the Laws of the Sixty-first Congress, second session, for the construction on a site at Milwaukee, Wis., already purchased by the Government for such purpose, of a suitable and commodious appraisers' stores building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and purpose of the United States Government appraising goods and merchandise imported from foreign countries and into Milwaukee, Wis., the additional sum of $50,000 is hereby authorized, at a total cost, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $125,000, for which plans, specifications, and full estimates shall previously be made and approved according to law.

With the following committee amendments:

With the following committee amendments:

Amend by striking from line 1, on page 2, the figures "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$40,000."

Strike from line 4, on page 2, the figures "$125,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$115,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on last unanimous-consent day this bill providing for an increase of limit to the cost for the erection of appraisers' stores building in Milwaukee, Wis., I asked that it might go over so that I might have an opportunity to look further into the merits of the proposition. During the intervening time I have looked up such arguments in favor of the bill as I have been able to get, principally those of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I have become convinced that this building as now planned can not be built without some additional appropriation. I doubt, however, whether it will be necessary to have as large an amount as $40,000. I will suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is said that the lowest bid was about $25,000 above the present available amount. Now, I think the gentleman is giving considerable of a margin to increase it to $40,000. I think that if he feels that it is necessary to have this appropriation he ought to be governed a little more by what the real amount above the bids is necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman I will say that both Assistant Secretary Hamlin and his predecessor, Mr. Allen, recommended that $40,000 additional be appropriated. The gentleman can readily understand that we do not wish to be in the same predicament when the new bids are received as we were when the last ones were received—that is, to have an inadequate appropriation so that we were unable to award the contract. In view of that statement, I really think it is absolutely necessary to have an additional appropriation, and if, perchance, the amount is a little in excess, there will be no change, and the Government will not be out a dollar.

Mr. FOSTER. I never heard of any money being turned back into the Treasury after having been appropriated for a public building

Mr. STAFFORD. We desire an ample appropriation, so that we can go right on with the building.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman can make this appropriation $30,000. I think there would be less objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should be afraid to take that risk, for we might be in the same position we were in before and run the risk of not having a sufficient amount of money to meet the contracts

Mr. FOSTER. It is so easy for people to come to Congress and ask for more than they really need that I think Congress ought to watch these matters closely.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Would not the allowance of this increase at this time prevent their coming to Congress subsequently asking for an increased appropriation. The growth in the city of Milwaukee in recent years is such as to warrant the demand now made for a building of this capacity, and it would be economy to grant it now.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I suppose in making the plans for this building they have anticipated something for the future?

Mr. STAFFORD. They have anticipated so far as the superstructure is concerned. It is to be a two-story building, so constructed that they can extend it three additional stories in case of need. However, as I stated to the gentleman before, the building is not an ornate building. It simply meets the pressing necessities of the business of Milwaukee. In fact, since this bill was considered, part of the basement of the present Federal building, where the appraisers' stores are now kept, is being utilized for parcel-post purposes, and there is a pressing need for an increase of space for both purposes. I do not wish to see the building further delayed by an appropriation that will not be sufficient to meet the needs.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not think but that $30,000 will be enough?

Mr. STAFFORD. I really do.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Andrus], who was a member of the Committee ou Public Buildings for a number of years, was a careful business man, and I think while on that committee he carefully looked into all matters pertaining to projects for buildings. He at that time thought they were giving all of the money that was necessary for this building.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman is aware that his estimate went awry, and the $75,000 he thought would be sufficient has not been sufficient, and we have been delayed more than a year by reason of his judgment being followed rather than that of the judgment of the Treasury officials. Here you have the judgment of the Treasury officials recommending $40,000.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.
Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster | has just spoken highly of the judgment of a gentleman from New York, a former Member of the House. Does not the gentleman from Illinois remember that a few years ago that particular gentleman from New York whom he has just mentioned informed the House with much earnestness that there was then being offered to the House a tract of land for $423,000, for which, he said, more than $600,000 had been asked a short time before, and that, in speaking of that alleged reduction, he said, "Evidently somebody's conscience had been pricked"? And does not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] also know that it was demonstrated on this floor that the gentleman from New York, Mr. Andrus, was utterly, completely mistaken in telling the House that the reduction was on the Rock Creek property, when as a matter of fact the reduction was on Meridian Hill property and not on Rock Creek property which was then before the House? That important mistake then made on this floor showed that the gentleman from New York, whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Fosten] has quoted as an authority, was very far from being infallible on propositions before the House involving dollars and cents.

If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] will further yield, I will add that in my judgment he has an absolutely Two Acting Secretaries of the Treasury have recomgood case. mended the proposed increase, and one of them, in an official letter to the House of Representatives, says:

As it is very improbable that such keen competition could be secured if the work were again placed on the market, it is estimated that an increase of $40,000 in the present limit of cost will be necessary to construct the building as designed.

Respectfully,

CHARLES S. HAMLIN, Acting Secretary.

That is followed up by a letter from Sherman Allen, Acting I hope that our good friend from Illinois will not Milwaukee is a growing city and already one of the country's really great manufacturing centers.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I realize there is some argument in what the gentleman from Wisconsin says, and yet I hesitate about voting to give additional appropriations for so many public buildings that are being authorized all over the country. I do not want to say there is a studied effort to have this done, but I will say that in a great number of cases which come to the attention of Congress we ought not to grant the request that is made for additional appropriations. Congress passes an authorization for a public building it ought to be the rule of the Treasury Department to construct that building within the limit of cost, unless it can be shown beyond question that it is necessary to increase the cost because of some conditions that have arisen since that time. In this case the gentleman from Wisconsin makes out a fairly good case, and yet my judgment upon the bill is that $40,000 is more money than they need. I do not think I shall object to this going through, and yet I believe we are making a mistake here in voting more money than is necessary for this project.

Mr. STAFFORD. Permit me to assure the gentleman that conversation with Assistant Secretary Sherman Allen, asking him whether there was any possible way whereby he could scale down the plans and specifications so as to provide for the erection of this building with the $75,000 appropriation. He stated that he could not. I did everything in my power, as I wanted to get the building built because there was pressing need for it. Now, I do not wish to be beset with the same condition by having an inadequate appropriation and to call for bids a second time by not having an adequate appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. I fully agree that this building ought to be built; I concede the necessity for it; and the urgent necessity for this building is the only reason why I am going to withdraw my objection; but I desire to say in the future, so far as I am individually concerned, if it is proposed to increase the limit of cost of these public buildings, they will not go through by unanimous consent unless the reason for the increase is very convincing.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that this proposition was thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that there was not a dissenting vote in that committee against a favorable report. Now, during the recent special session of Congress we reported three or four emergency propositions for Members who sat on the other side of the Chamber, and in discussing it we thought we ought to recognize this side, and we picked this proposition out as one of the emergency propositions that had merit in it and ought to receive the approval of the committee and the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that the gentleman from Tennessee, my good friend, is undertaking to say on the floor of this House that because we passed one or two bills on this side then you ought to pass one or two on that side. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee very frankly that so far as my understanding of these bills is concerned it does not matter whether they belong on that side or this side or any other side, and we ought not to be governed by any political reasons whatever.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to say this— Mr. FOSTER. While it may be politics has been played in

Mr. FOSTER. While it may be politics has been played in the allowance of some public buildings—

Mr. AUSTIN. Absolutely none in this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not doubt that, but if it is done it is a bad thing, and they ought to be built where they are necessary for the good of the public service.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to say to the gentleman I have been on that committee five years, and there has been absolutely no politics at all, but every proposition has been upon its merits alone; but complaint was made to the committee that during the special session of Congress we reported emergency cases for the majority Members of this House and had failed to investigate and report a single meritorious proposition from this side of the House, and the gentleman will doubtless recall, Augusta (Ga) case, that we passed through this House, I think, by unanimous consent or vote, a bill to increase the limit of cost of the public building at that place $125,000, and in view of that fact and in view of the merits of this proposition view of that fact and in view of the merits of this proposed it ought to go through without a single dissenting vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. Question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). The gentle-man from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

Page 2, line 4, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$40,000." Page 2, line 7, strike out "$125,000" and insert "$115,000."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Stafford, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next

UNITED STATES FISH RESERVATION, BAIRD, CAL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent when this matter was last under consideration, and information was conveyed to me by the Assistant Secretary that the bids were beyond the amount appropriated, I went down and had a States fish reservation at Baird, Shasta County, Cal. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the people of the State of California are hereby granted the right to open and perpetually maintain a State highway, to be constructed under and by virtue of the provisions of the State highways act of California, upon and across the United States fishery reservation at Baird, Shasta County, Cal., according to a location approved by the Secretary of Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask my distinguished friend from California [Mr. Raker] why this bill was sent to the Committee on the Public Lands, where it did not belong, rather than to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which had the proper jurisdiction of it?

Mr. RAKER. I will answer that as nearly as I can. It was placed in the basket-

Mr. MANN. I apprehend that when it was put in the basket it had a memorandum on it. At least, all the bills I put in the basket I place a memorandum upon as to the committee to which they are to be referred. Of course, it does not bind a bill.

Mr. FERRIS. The Committee on the Public Lands always handles those bills.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. The Committee on the Public Lands does not have the jurisdiction over any hatcheries. Fish hatcheries do not come from the Committee on the Public

Mr. FERRIS. Here is a great reservation made of public lands. What for? For fish-hatchery purposes. We have nothing to do with the buildings.

Mr. MANN. And you have nothing to do with the land.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not so sure about that. It is public land.
Mr. MANN. I am sure about it. The same way as to the lighthouses; you have no jurisdiction over a lighthouse reservation or over a life-saving reservation or a fisheries reserva-

Mr. FERRIS. We grant the right of way over public lands all the time.

Mr. MANN. Not over reservations where other committees have jurisdiction of the particular matter.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know about that. Of course, we are not building fish hatcheries.

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman inform me under what law this fish reservation was created?

Mr. RAKER. I think you will find it was an act of Congress. I do not have the date here. The Attorney General went over the matter fully with the authorities in the State of California, the highway commission, and also with the Bureau of Fisheries. The State tried to get the right of way through the commission of commerce, and they held that it was created by act of Congress as a fish reservation. This is my belief.

Mr. MONDELL. What act of Congress?
Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. And being for that purpose, and that alone, they would have to apply to Congress for a right of way across that particular tract of land, which has 280 acres in the reservation.

Mr. MONDELL. Under what act of Congress?

Mr. RAKER. I have not the special act.
Mr. MONDELL. Under what act of Congress was the land reserved?

Mr. RAKER. I have not the special act, and I did not think it was necessary

Mr. MONDELL. Well, is it the gentleman's opinion that there is any act of Congress concerning it? Does the gentle-man have in mind any act of Congress which authorizes the creation of fish reservations?

Mr. RAKER. My recollection is, but I would not like to state it definitely, that this is a reservation reserved by departmental order, and then the fish hatchery was established. That is my understanding of it, but I would not want that to be considered as definite without first going to the statute to confirm it. But the matter having been taken up directly with the Attorney General and with the Secretary of Commerce, they have stated that it was necessary to have a special act of Congress to secure the right of way across the reservation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. MANN. I notice the bill is reported without amendment, and I notice that the Attorney General says:

I have the honor to suggest that an amendment of the bill may be advisable.

Why is not the Attorney General's amendment incorporated in the bill?

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman I will state that the exact language referred to in the Attorney General's opinion is in the bill now as reported to the House.

Mr. MANN. Could not the Attorney General tell whether it was in there or not?

Mr. RAKER. Well, it is in there now.
Mr. MANN. Why, the Attorney General reports upon a bill nine lines long, and recommends an amendment be added to the bill. The gentleman says the amendment is already in the bill, while the Attorney General recommends that an amendment be added to it.

Mr. RAKER. It is. The committee took it up and considered it, and it is in the exact language recommended by the Attorney General. The Attorney General's opinion reads as follows:

The location to be approved by the Secretary of Commerce.

The bill provides that the highway is to be constructedaccording to a location approved by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. MANN. Why did the Attorney General recommend that the bill be amended? Does not the gentleman suppose that the Attorney General had read the bill?

Mr. RAKER. The recommendation made by the Attorney General and the language of the bill correspond. It was the intention, from the recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce, that it should be located according to the direction of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to reflect upon the Attorney General by assuming that he had read a bill covering nine lines and then wrote a report several pages long recommending an amendment to the bill to insert something that was already in the bill of nine lines. That would be a serious reflection, not necessarily on the Attorney General himself personally, but on some one in his office.

Mr. COX. What amendment did the gentleman state? Mr. MANN. The amendment that the gentleman read The amendment that the gentleman read, I confess from lack of knowledge, seemed to me to be already in the Yet I could not conceive of the Attorney General reading a bill nine lines long and then writing a report several pages long recommending an amendment to be inserted in it that was already in it.

Mr. FERRIS. Might not the gentleman take this view of it: That the Attorney General was especially solicitous to have that language retained in the bill, so that he wanted to call it to the attention of the committee, and the committee, finding it already there, kept it there?

Mr. MANN. I hope the Attorney General or some one in his office will have his attention called to it, and I hope that he will be sufficiently solicitous about such matters as to ask the gentleman who really makes a report hereafter to read a bill before he makes a report on it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether he does not think this bill ought to carry another section—reserving the right to alter, repeal, or amend?

Mr. MANN. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that if consideration is given to the bill I propose to offer an amendment to that effect

Mr. RAKER. Of course I would not make any fight on it. would rather have that in than not to pass the bill.

Mr. MANN. It is only a matter of custom, probably.

Mr. RAKER. I see no objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the bill under consideration, to constitute section 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new section, as follows: "SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment by inserting the words "to be" in line 8 after the word location."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Len-

ROOT .

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 8, after the word "location," by inserting the words "to be."

Mr. RAKER. I have no objection to that. It is simply grammatical. It is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIEU LANDS, IMPERIAL COUNTY, CAL,

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 122) authorizing the State of California to select public lands in lieu of certain lands granted to it in Imperial County, Cal., and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of California or its grantees may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, reconvey to the United States any of the lands heretofore granted to said State in the townships authorized to be resurveyed by the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. L., p. 728), and select in lieu thereof an equal amount of vacant, unappropriated, surveyed, unreserved, nonmineral public lands within said State: Provided, That any application to select land under this act must be presented within three years from the date of its passage: Provided further. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent conveying to Victor E. Shaw, of Los Angeles, Cal., the south half of section 26, in township 11 south, range 13 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, containing 320 acres, in Imperial County, Cal., upon the express and prior condition that said Victor E. Shaw shall execute and deliver to the Secretary of the Interior a grant and deed satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior a grant and deed satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior relinquishing and conveying to the Government of the United States all his right, title, and interest in and to the north half of section 36, in township 16 south, range 13 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, Imperial County, Cal., according to the original survey, containing 320 acres, now known as part of tract 37, in township 16 south, ranges 13 and 14 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, according to the resurvey.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior may make proper rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not introduce a bill of this character in the House. The committee had no jurisdiction to report it. It is not possible to combine in one bill a private bill and a public bill under the rules of the House. The bill would undoubtedly take a little time, and I suggest to the gentleman that he ask to pass it over to-day.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman will not—

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not express any hope about it.

Mr. RAKER. I always have hope until the last breath is drawn.

Mr. MANN. What I am trying to get at now is whether the gentleman desires to have the next hour consumed on this bill or whether he wishes to pass it over and give other gentlemen an opportunity to have their bills considered. The gentleman has the opportunity to ask unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice. If he does not wish to do that, he will have to take the consequences.

Mr. RAKER. Of course the consequences will be disastrous to the bill, and that being the case, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MANN. The first consequence would be that I would argue the point of order for some time, unless objection were made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. I do not want to delay other gentlemen, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent to pass the bill without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to pass the bill without prejudice. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

STEAMSHIPS "BUCKMAN" AND "WATSON."

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10084) to authorize the changing of the names of the steamships Buckman and Watson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed, upon the application of the owner, the Alaska Pacific Steamship Co., of Portland, Me., to change the name of the steamship Buckman, official number 3904, and to change the name of the steamship Watson, official number 81788.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Johnson] what is the purpose of changing the names of these vessels?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been reported from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The report explains the purpose. The company owning these vessels, the steamships Watson and Buckman, has changed its name to the Admiral Line, and the purpose is to change the names of these two steamships to the Admiral Watson and Admiral Evans. The vessels being encumbered, it requires an act of Congress to authorize the change of the name.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there not some law which prevents the changing of the name of a vessel unless a certain amount of money is expended in repairs?

Mr. MANN. No; these are American vessels.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It requires an act of Congress to authorize the change of name, because these vessels are encumbered. The vessels are now in the dry dock, and ready to come out as soon as these changes of name are authorized.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this relieve the vessels from any financial obligation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. On the contrary, it guarantees that the obligation shall attach to the vessels under their new names. The report is quite full. Exactly similar bills have passed for the steamships Syracuse, Boston, Harry A. Hayward, and others.

Mr. MADDEN. If there is a libel against these ships, does the libel still obtain?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly. Every legal obligation will stand. In addition to the report of the committee, we have a report from the Department of Commerce, authorizing this, or, rather, not objecting to it.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Johnson of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COPYRIGHTS

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9897) to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

The bill was read as follows:

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 12. That after copyright has been secured by publication of the work with the notice of copyright as provided in section 9 of this act, there shall be promptly deposited in the copyright office or in the mail addressed to the register of copyrights, Washington, D. C., two complete copies of the best edition thereof them published, or if the work is by an author who is a citizen or subject of a foreign state or nation and has been published in a foreign country, one complete copy of the best edition then published in such foreign country, which copies or copy, if the work be a book or periodical, shall have been produced in accordance with the manufacturing provisions specified in section 15 of this act; or if such work be a contribution to a periodical, for which contribution special registration is requested, one copy of the issue or issues containing such contribution; or if the work is not reproduced in copies for sale there shall be deposited the copy, print, photograph, or other identifying reproduction provided by section 11 of this act, such copies or copy, print, photograph, or other reproduction to be accompanied in each case by a claim of copyright. No action or proceeding shall be maintained for infringement of copyright in any work until the provisions of this act with respect to the deposit of copies and registration of such work shall have been complied with."

Sec. 2. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Sec. 3. That this act shall go into effect on the 1st day of January, 1914.

With a committee amendment striking out section 3.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, should like to ask the gentleman in what respect this alters

Mr. Mann. Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is in charge of this bill, but I can give that information. The only difference between the present law and this bill is the inserting of this language:

Or if the work is by an author who is a citizen or subject of a foreign state or nation and has been published in a foreign country, one complete copy of the best edition then published in such foreign country, which copies or copy, if the work be a book or periodical, shall have been produced in accordance with the manufacturing provisions specified in sections 15 of this act.

The existing law requires two copies of the best edition; and it is stated in the report that sometimes the copies are so expensive that they refuse to take out any copyright here, and the librarian thinks they would take out a copyright if they only had to furnish one copy of the best edition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is usually very accurate, but I think he is in error. The report says that if this requirement of two copies be insisted upon it may result in foreign publishers not taking out a copyright.

Mr. MANN. I understand that to be the fact, that they might be willing to furnish one copy, whereas they are not willing to

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there was no copyright taken out, that might be advantageous to the public, because they could publish it here without infringement

Mr. MANN. But these highly technical books or fancy editions, no one wants to republish here. Mr. GOLDFOGLE. As I understand, these books come to the library in a printed form from the other side,

M. MANN. I understand so.
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do not see how it is so very expensive.
Mr. MANN. If a book costs $100 or $50 a volume to get it

Mr. MANN. If a book costs $100 or $50 a volume to get it up, that makes it quite expensive to furnish two volumes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I can not see why, simply because it is a little more expensive to furnish another volume, the law should be changed, especially in this hurried way.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. I find in the report that it is stated—

It seems highly probable that insistence much the denosit of two

Mr. COOPER. I find in the report that it is stated—
It seems highly probable that insistence upon the deposit of two copies in the case of expensive works may result in the foreign publisher remitting his claim to copyright rather than pay the cost involved, and therefore no deposit may be made in the case of such books. In such cases the library would not receive the books, and if copies are required would be obliged to purchase them. During the time since the copyright act went into effect, July 1, 1909, a considerable number of valuable works, including expensive engravings and works on art and architecture and modern and highly desirable scientific and technical books, have been deposited and placed in the library. It is believed that if only one copy were required as proposed in the bill instead of two copies as now, a larger number of valuable books of that character would be deposited, and the library and its users would be correspondingly benefited.

Mr. FOSTER As I understand if this proposed law will

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand it, this proposed law will affect only foreign copyrights?

Mr. MANN. It changes the law only as to foreign copyrights. Mr. FOSTER. The old law still applies in this country, and authors here must file two copies?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. So we are giving the foreigner an advantage over our own people?

Mr. MANN. Yes; to that extent. We are giving it at the request of the Librarian of Congress, who says that under the existing law they do not get any copies of many things, and he thinks that if it is limited to one copy that they would get more.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be a good plan, but it occurs to me that there are in the United States authors who might want to print books that would be just as valuable as those printed in foreign countries.

Mr. MANN. But there is not the same inducement for a foreigner to copyright a book in this country that there is for an American author to copyright a book.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I think that is true.
Mr. MANN. That is the situation. The Librarian of Congress thinks that we gain by it, and I think his judgment usually is right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 2, strike out section 3, "that this act shall go into effect on the 1st day of January, 1914."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9574) to authorize the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from a point on the Missouri shore near the confinence of Bear Creek with said Mississippi River to a point in the State of

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. ANDREWS BAY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11283) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

was the bill (H. R. 11283) to nuthorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Birmingham, Columbus & St. Andrews Railroad Co., a corporation duly created and existing, is hereby authorized to build and maintain a railroad bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay, in Bay County, Fla., at or near a point on the north arm of said bay known as Grassy Point, on North Bay, the said bridge to be so constructed as not to interfere with the navigation of said navigable waters.

SEC. 2. That any bridge constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of said navigable waters as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company shall submit not the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the proposed bridge and a map of the location, giving, for the space of at least one-half mile above and one-half mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the arm of the bay, the shore lines at high and low water, and the direction and strength of the current, and the soundings accurately showing the bed of the stream, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War.

Sec. 3. Page 1, line 7, at the beginning of the line, insert the word "Wash-

Page 1, lines 7 and 8, after the word "point," insert the words "suitable to the interests of navigation."

Page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, strike out the words "the said bridge to be so constructed as not to interfere with the navigation of said navigable waters" and insert the words "in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906."

Pages 2, 3, and 4, strike out sections 2, 3, and 4.

Page 4, change the numbers of the sections 5 and 6 to 2 and 3.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Unless there is objection, all of the amendments will be put en grosse.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like the first amendment to be put separately, so that it may be disagreed to. It transpired that the amendment made by the committee was not warranted by the geography of Florida. As a matter of fact, this location is in Bay County, and not in Washington County, so that that amendment ought to be disagreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When did the gentleman get his geography corrected, and by whom?
Mr. COVINGTON. By the gentleman from Florida [Mr.

WILSON]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the other committee amendments as reported by the Clerk will be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the gentleman to an error in reference to section 2 of the bill as amended. Originally section 5 ought to go out entirely, and that was evidently an inadvertence. That will be involved in one of these hills

Mr. COVINGTON. I think the gentleman is correct. I did not have charge of the amendments of this bill at the time it was considered in the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer that as an amendment to an amendment?

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment made by the committee to strike out section 5 and insert section 2 in place thereof. That relates to the numbering of the section. I think that the whole section ought to go out and I wish to offer an amendment to strike out that section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the question whether the gentleman's proposition is an amendment to the bill or an amendment to an amendment?

Mr. MANN. The reason I answered the question as I did is because the committee has recommended the numbering of section 5 to be stricken out and that section 2 be inserted, and if the House would agree to that it might not be possible afterwards to I want to strike it out.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Is not that simply a matter of re-

Mr. MANN. That is renumbering.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, strike out all of lines 9 to 12, inclusive, being the language:
"SEC, 5. That the act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the approval of the act."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that amendment and all of the others will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I think the words "or near," in line 7, page 1, should be stricken out, and I move to strike them out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As it reads, it says "near a point suitable to the interests of navigation." Of course, that evidently was not intended. The bill originally read, "at or near a point on the north arm of said bay." I think if the gentleman would insert a comma after the word "point" and after the word "navigation" it would reached a comma after the same and after the word "navigation".

a comma after the word "point" and after the word "navigation" it would probably cover the case.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it should be near a point. It should be at the point suitable for navigation.

Mr. MANN. But this is at or near a point on the north arm of said bay known as Grassy Point. It might not be just at Grassy Point that it was suitable to the interests of navigation.

Mr. COOPER. It seems to me that the only not the content of the comme to the content of the cooperation.

Mr. COOPER. It seems to me that the only way that a law of this kind should be drawn is in the ordinary form, and that is that the bridge must be constructed at a point suitable to the interests of navigation on the north arm of so and so and not near a point.

Mr. COVINGTON. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin, he is entirely accurate. The ordinary form of that clause of a bridge bill is, "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," but the statement of the gentleman from Illinois is also correct that the original act was intended to provide for the location of this bridge near a point on the north arm of the the location of this bridge near a point on the north arm of the bay known as Grassy Point. If you will transpose that language and make it "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," and then leave in the expression "near a point on the north arm of said bay," and so forth, that will meet the situation.

Mr. MANN. Make the language read like this and it would be clear: "At a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the north arm of said bay known as Grassy Point."

Mr. COVINGTON. So that the language will read, "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near a point on the north arm of said bay," and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "or near."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COVINGTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to insert in line 8, after the word "navigation," the words "at or near a point."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "navigation," insert the words "at or near a point."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend page 4, in line 13, by striking out "section 3" and inserting the words "section 2" in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 13, strike out the words "section 3" and insert in lieu thereof the words "section 2."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Division, Mr. Speaker. The House divided; and there were-ayes 35, noes 0. So the bill was passed.

TOLL BRIDGE ACROSS THE HUDSON RIVER AT TROY, N. Y.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11325) to authorize the reconstruction of the existing toll bridge across the Hudson River at Troy, N. Y., and the maintenance of the bridge so constructed.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, granted to the Troy & West Troy Bridge Co., a corporation organized under an act of the Legislature of the State of New York, passed April 23, 1872, known as chapter 310 of the laws of 1872, entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Hudson River at the city of Troy," its successors and assigns, to reconstruct the bridge of said company with the necessary piers, abutments, and approaches and to maintain and operate the same across the Hudson River from the foot of Congress Street in the city of Troy, State of New York, to a point on the opposite side of the said river in the city of Watervillet, on the line of the existing bridge of said company; but such reconstruction shall be subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act oregulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the time of the commencement of the reconstruction of

SEC. 2. That the time of the commencement of the reconstruction of said bridge shall be within one year and said bridge shall be completed within three years from the date of the passage of this act.
SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "from," insert the words "a point suitable to the interest of navigation at." Page 2, line 7, insert, at the beginning of the line, the words "at a point suitable to the interest of navigation." Page 2, line 9, strike out the words "subject to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in accordance with." Page 2, strike out all of section 2, lines 13, 14, 15, and 16. Line 17, change the section

The CPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland of what use it is to insert the customary language which the gentleman has inserted by amendment, "a point suitable to the interest of navigation," if following that is language fixing the location at the foot of Congress Street?

Mr. CO.INGTON. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I am not familiar enough with the street locations of the city of Troy to know whether that language has any meaning or is meaningless.

Mr. COOPER. War Department. That does not leave any discretion with the

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion with regard to that. A bridge is now located at this place, and the insertion "at a point suitable to the interest of navigation" would be construed by the War Department as authority to place it somewhere else, if they did not deem that point suitable to the interest of navigation.

Mr. COOPER. I did not know that a bridge is now located there.

Mr. MANN. There is a bridge located there.

Mr. COVINGTON. There is an existing bridge to be reconstructed. It has been in use for a good many years, and is used by the electric railways going back and forth across the Hudson River. This amendment is in conformity with the suggestion made by the War Department. It was in fact framed by the War Department. The bill was transmitted to the War Department for their views, and it came back with the alterations in its language in the form in which it is now presented to the House. I think it is for the purpose the gentleman from Illinois suggests.

Mr. MANN. I think it is fair to say that I originated the expression "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," after the national bridge law was enacted, and consulted with the War Department as to what, in their opinion, would be the effect if we said "at a point suitable to navigation from A Street in one place to B Street in another," because that would absolutely fix the point, and we pass many a bill like that.

And we inserted "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," and the officials stated it would be construed, if that went in, that if they considered it was not a point suitable to the interests of navigation they would not issue the permit.

Mr. COOPER. Replying to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann], while not wishing in any way to criticize the construction of a statute by the War Department, yet it strikes me as possibly a little forced to say that when Congress, which, under the Constitution, has exclusive jurisdiction over navigable waters, says in a statute that a bridge shall be constructed at "Congress Street at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," the War Department can say that that point is not suitable to the interests of navigation. When, by statute, Congress has said, "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at Congress Street," that language ought, under the ordinary rules of statutory construction, to be held a finding by Congress that it would be suitable to the interests of navigation to build a bridge at that street.

Mr. MANN. It is undoubtedly susceptible to that construction, but when Congress adopted the policy of inserting that language in these bills it was not for the purpose of determining that the point was suitable to the interests of navigation, but for the purpose of having the War Department determine whether it was suitable to the interests of navigation.

Mr. COOPER. But the gentleman from Illinois will remember that the ordinary language in this, "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," not at "a certain street at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. COVINGTON. The effect of this language is simply that where the two expressions are placed in the act, the one dealing with the interests of navigation is paramount to the one fixing the location. The engineers think they have the power, when both expressions are used in the act, to determine which shall be paramount, and they always rule that the interests of navigation are paramount to the location clause of the act. That is a forced construction, but that is the practice.

Mr. COOPER. It is not only somewhat forced, but it is badly forced if, when Congress says they may construct a bridge at Congress Street, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, the department can hold that it is not a point suitable to the interests of navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, your committee deems it wise not only to bear in mind always the principle but to preserve the form, especially where it can do no harm. If this street is just the width of the bridge proposed, which is improbable, and the War Department is favorable to building it at that place, it has done no harm for us to preserve the form as well as the principle. If, on the contrary, the War Department should determine that at that street, or on any side of that street or in the middle of that street, it was not a point suitable to the interests of navigation, the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and the bridge would not be constructed at all. I do not know whether the bridge is exactly the width of the street or not. I do not think there is any trouble in the matter myself

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Covington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the immigration bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Before that is done I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [The Speaker proceeded to count.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnerr] withdraws the point, and the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Hay] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6060, which the Clerk will read by title. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday there was left 20 minutes' debate on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle].

Mr. LOBECK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House— Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman for or against this amendment?

Mr. LOBECK. I am opposed to the literacy test as expressed in this bill. I believe that the test for honesty should be made at the source. I believe we should determine on the other side of the water, before the intending immigrant embarks on the steamship for our shores, whether he will be fit morally to become an inhabitant of this country and make a good, honest citizen. We have the necessary machinery to do the work through our Consular Service.

I believe that honesty, a good record, properly verified to by the officials from whence the immigrants come and presented to the United States officials for approval before being permitted to take passage on vessels coming to our ports of entry, is by far a better test than the so-called literacy test to secure a good citizenship for the United States.

I am the son of foreign-born parents, born in Illinois. My father came to this country because he could not agree with a monarchy in his own, and my mother and her family came to this country to find a home. Their history as citizens of this country was of the best type, honored and respected in every community in which they lived.

The story of those people who came in that early day to western Illinois is almost tragic. I hold in my hand a photographic copy of the list of 225 passengers, old and young, who came over in the bark Charles Tottie in 1849 and landed in New York. Thence they went by boat up the Hudson and by Erie Canal and around the Lakes they came to Chicago, seeking a home in that far western country. Asiatic cholera came, was epidemic at the time, and of my mother's own family of 11, 6 passed away after they came to Chicago and on journey to the new home in western Illinois.

How those people surmounted those difficulties is something wonderful. My father was an educated man. The family would not have been eliminated by this bill on account of the literacy test. The New England settlers that lived in that countrythe Americans-came to him for advice and for help to conduct their business. Those people knew what it meant to develop the country, and the American of that day who lived in that country had to hustle and move forward to keep up with the The door of my parents was ever open to all procession. honest people, however poor; to every nationality, foreign born or native, regardless of creed or religion, and they were ever welcome. I do not know whether every man and woman or child on the bark Charles Tottie could read or write. makes no difference, for I do know that they tilled the soil, sowed the seeds, harvested the crops, and made that country blossom as a rose.

I have had some experience among these people. As a clerk, as a traveling man throughout the Western States, as a merchant, and as a public official for many years I have been brought into close contact with the German, with the Scandinavian, with the Bohemian, with the Pole, Hungarian, the Jewish, and the people from southern Europe, Jew or gentile. A large majority of them have become good citizens, have supported our public schools, have paid promptly the taxes levied for city, county, school, or State purposes, and their children have attended our schools and have made an enviable record in educational lines for themselves.

I do not know whether the widow "Anna Maja" who came on that vessel could read or write. It may be she could not. But when the call came for men to save the Union, she sent her three sons to the front, and they rendered honorable service, as a soldier should do. The same story could be told of the immigrants that went to Texas. I have read a story of a family who went there in the early thirties, when Texas was seeking her independence, where they fought side by side with the native born; and when this country got into civil war they followed their neighbors and stood for what they believed was right. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska

has expired.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Lobeck] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOBECK. In every avenue of activity from the Atlantic coast to our western shores they did their full share to develop the resources of the Nation. They have been successful, first as laborers, then farmers, mechanics, miners, lumbermen, factory men, and city builders, as merchants, bankers, and educators, they have succeeded with the foremost in the Nation.

As inventors, our immigrants have been keen to observe; their inventions have been a great factor in modern methods of business. Their brain and handiwork are shown in agricultural and mechanical implements.

The great inventors of the present are Morse, Bell, Edison, Ericsson, and Marconi. Their inventions have revolutionized the methods of peace and war.

Time does not permit me to go into details, but the immigrant coming to our shores has kept up with the high standards of to-day. These immigrants in the last century were in the main to-day. These immigrants in the last century were in the main poor. They were often spoken of in derision. Many did not seem desirable; but as a class they have been helpful to our civilization.

I do not believe that the literacy test is the better test to exclude undesirable immigrants. I believe that every restrictive measure should be strictly enforced that will bar the vicious, the diseased of body and mind from coming to our shores.

I am in favor of enacting law that will provide that every single man or woman over 16 years of age, every married man or head of a family, whether educated or illiterate, shall furnish to our consuls, or any official designated by the United States, a certificate signed and properly verified by the officials of city or country in which they live or have resided as to their moral character; that they must have a clean record as to honesty and good citizenship; and that the steamship companies receiving the immigrants must have presented to them these certificates of good character before they can accept them as passengers, subject to such rules and regulations as set forth by our Government. In that way we will get a good type of immigrants. The literacy test does not prevent the undesirable from coming here, but it does prevent good, honest men who have not had the advantage of an education in their old homes, who wish to come and hope to make homes here for themselves and their families.

Further, the so-called literacy test will not long bar immigrants from coming.

Education is spreading everywhere, so this test will not long be a bar to those who wish to come.

Originally the people coming to America were called colonists or settlers; to-day we use the word "immigrants." Many of the English who came were not able to read. The same can be said of other nationalities, but they have become a good citizenship. Many of our leading statesmen and educators believe that a test for morality is far better than the literacy test.

President Wilson several times during his campaign for Chief Executive spoke and wrote freely in favor of a liberal immigration policy. I quote from one of his letters:

I think that this country can afford to use and ought to give opportunity to every man and woman of sound morals, sound mind, and sound body who comes in good faith to spend his or her energies in our life, and I should certainly be inclined, so far as I am concerned, to scrutinize very jealously any restrictions that would limit that principle in practice.

A splendid sentiment, which every good citizen can indorse. Further, I quote extracts from college presidents:

[Harry Pratt Judson, LL. D., president University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.]

If we can establish a test which will exclude those who are really undestrable—that is, who are unlikely to make intelligent, industrious, and law-ablding citizens—such test I shall approve. I do not believe that the literacy test conforms to that condition.

[Bernard J. Otting, S. J., president St. Louis University, St. Louis, Mo.] I can not respect the intelligence of the man who can make literacy the test of fitness, and I am driven to suspect some underlying motive—which he is ashamed to make public—in the statesman who would make this test the law.

[Edward Cummings, S. J., president Spring Hill College, Mobile, Ala.] Read the roster of our great men these days and you will find them children of men that came over here to escape persecution without, perchance, the knowledge of the alphabet.

[Lyon G. Tyler, LL. D., president College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va.]

Illiteracy is a mere accident that may affect a family in one generation, but be conspicuously absent from succeeding generations.

[George Lewis Mackintosh, president Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Ind.]

Unquestionably immigrants who could not measure up to the most rudimentary test of literacy may yet be industrious, honest, and very desirable men.

[George S. Davis, LL. D., president Normal College of the City of New York.]

It [the literacy test] would be inadequate and misleading, often resulting in the exclusion of worthy and desirable additions to our population.

[John Cavanaugh, C. S. C., president University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.]

I am convinced that the effort to restrict immigration by a literacy test is un-American as well as unwise.

[James A. B. Scherer, LL. D., president Throop College of Technology, Pasadena, Cal.]

I used to incline toward a belief in much stricter immigration laws, but upon becoming acquainted with the sons and daughters of possibly objectionable immigrants, I saw that the "melting pot" does its work effectively and advantageously.

[Stephen M. Newman, D. D., president Howard University, Washington, D. C.]

Some of the best immigrants who ever came to America could not read when they landed, but settled down into helpful American lives. I do not believe that a literacy test should be enacted.

[Herbert L. Stetson, LL. D., president Kalamazoo College, Kalamazoo, Mich.]

I believe that immigrants fleeing from religious and political per-secution should not be subjected to a literacy test should such test be enacted.

[Winthrop E. Stone, LL. D., president Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind.]

There are many valuable men and women who could be of service in this country who possibly can not read and write.

I believe I am representing the opinion of a large majority of my constituents when I believe and stand for that honesty, morality, good character, and a good citizenship shall be the test for men and women of healthy mind and body coming to our land. I have received the following telegrams asking me to protest and vote against the literacy test in this bill now being considered, as follows:

Further, I quote from an article credited to the Omaha Daily News that seems singularly appropriate in this discussion:

ANOTHER SIDE OF IMMIGRATION.

ANOTHER SIDE OF IMMIGRATION.

This is a nation of immigrants, sons and grandsons of immigrants. It must not be forgotten that the Indian is your only true American native, and even the Indian is denied this claim by some scientists who assert he is a mere interloper from Asia by way of the Bering Straits.

It is well to remember this when one hears the periodical agitation in Congress about restriction of immigration. The right kind of restriction is one thing, but there is another kind which virtually says: "We are in. You are out. You stay out."

But there is still another side to immigration. It is the bitter, cruel industrial side which uses the blood and brawn, the bodies and the lives of the children of immigrants to further our so-called progress, to build our great works, to carry on our great undertakings. Gordon Thayer thus expresses it in exceptionally strong verses in the Survey:

Breed us more men, ye daughters of toil, Ye alien mothers in far-off lands;
Sire them strongly, clean brawn and bone,
For we slift from the chaff the wheat alone When they come to die at our hands.

Think on our greed in your travail throes, When they come to die at our hands.
Think on our greed in your travall throes,
Think of us when ye bare your breast.
Mine and smelter shall claim their toll,
Roads shall be broken and reach their goal,
Though ye smell their blood from the West. Though ye smell their blood from the West.

We build us strong on your woman's woe
Pier of granite and fron span,
Glare of furnace and caisson's gloom,
Crane and derrick, shall rear the tomb
Of nim whom ye gave us—a man.

Seas shall not bar your sons from harm;
Steppe or forest or alpine slope,
Our arms are long to grasp what we need;
The New World springs from your trampled seed;
Ye drain the dregs of our draught of hope.

d like to see that poem in the hands of every agitate

We would like to see that poem in the hands of every agitator against "foreigners." We believe it would cause them to temper their speech, to soften their assertions, to be just a little more genuinely American in their way of approaching a great and serious subject.—Omaha (Nebr.) News.

There are human derelicts on every hand. They come from every class. The hobo ranks of to-day are recruited from the educated as well as the illiterate. This is familiar to every Member present. They have come to your doors and mine. I cast no stone at these unfortunates. I would rather extend a helping hand.

The children of the present immigrant attend our public schools. They are anxious to secure an education. So was the immigrant child in the past. Therefore, I see in the future a great citizenship that will help make this a great Republic, prosperous Nation, a leader for better government among the nations of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a deep impression has been made on the Members of this House by the argument offered by the opponents of the literacy test. Some of it has appealed to our patriotism. Others have touched the chord of real martyrdom, while still others have placed the cause on the basis of costhat the Nation's sympathy should mopolitan philanthropygo out to all the world.

While I appreciate very deeply the strength of that argument, and while I recognize the "talking" points in opposition to this test and to the bill, yet I really believe, as a Member of the House anxious and desirous to vote right, that we ought not to allow mere sentiment to direct us entirely on this vote, but we ought also to appeal to the future of our own country as well as to the unfortunate situation of the people who live in other countries. That being the thing that is most deeply impressed upon my mind, I am going to vote for this bill [applause], and I am also going to vote for this test.

I do not think, to say the least, that it is inconsistent for an American citizen who lives in a State that requires educacation by compulsory law, and who lives in a Nation in which most of the States have compulsory education, to require as much of the foreign immigrant as we require of our own individuals.

It seems to me that if we require an educational test on the part of our own people and regard the lack of education as sufficiently undesirable so that we make compulsory laws to remove that lack we ought not to be regarded as unwise, unfair, or inhuman when we put the same test upon the immigrant who comes to our shores.

If this bill shut out the victims of religious persecution, I would vote against it, but it does not. The individual who is persecuted for his religion can come to our country under this law. If the argument was put upon the arrogant basis of religious narrowness, I would also vote against it, and if one who can not read would be permanently excluded by this bill I would vote against it; but to the industrious person in Europe who desires to fit himself to meet the requirements of this bill it only defers the time of his coming, for he can ultimately meet that requirement, as we have shown in many of our States where we have removed adult illiteracy.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, believing that it is in the interest of a higher citizenship and that it will bring to us better immigrants, I shall vote for this test, in the belief that it is my duty to look squarely to the effect of the influx of foreign population into our country upon the future citizenship of our country. There are those who say that the immigrants who come to this country can be assimilated easily. I admit that that used to be true, but when you pick up a little Italy and set it down in one of our cities you multiply the problems of our cities, the one signal, serious situation in our country to-day.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman know the fact that in my city of New York the schools in the parts of the city where foreign-born population are most numerous are crowded with foreign children who learn quickly, and even the night schools are filled with many of the foreign adults who learn English quickly? In other words, they assimilate readily

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, my time is running. I understand what the gentleman says is true. I have not a word to say against the foreigner or his children. I realize what has been done by the American system of schools in New York and Pittsburgh and other centers, but what I mean is that we do not want to voluntarily increase illiteracy in this country by a system of immigration, when our laws are against illiteracy and in favor of compulsory education for our own people. What the distinguished gentleman from New York says is but a corroboration of my statement to the effect that the desirable, industrious citizen of Europe, who is now shut out by this test, may remove the inability. It only shuts out that element without energy and industry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to the critic who twits those who favor this section as arrogant and pharisaical, as one who thanks his Maker that he is not as other men are, we answer: While we desire to favor the unfortunate of other countries our sympathy for them must not interfere with our duty to care for those who have already landed upon our shores. Sentiment must not prevent our quick comprehension that Europe's relief of millions of emigrants is our burden.

So long as we could certainly Americanize the immigrant by actual contact, the fear of foreignizing the American did not appear. But at a time when the rate of importation actually endangers foreign dominance it is time to call a halt. No man will go further than I in his admiration for those who have come to our shores and who have distinguished themselves in every line. No man can say our Government has not been the most magnanimous in its policy toward our naturalized citizens. Think of it! Here upon this floor, in the very Capitol of the Republic itself, we hear pleading the cause of immigration the men who are living examples of the magnanimity of this coun-You must not think us unkind if we say we pity your unfortunate foreign lands, but we must legislate for the future of our own people as well. We can not safely permit our pity to multiply the problems of our cities, to stimulate the various born under foreign oppression and propagated here in American soil. Ignorance has ever been regarded a handicap, to be removed if possible. Education has ever been looked upon as a goal to be reached. In this country the major portion of the people's energies has been and is now being devoted to the removal of the incubus of ignorance by a system of education, in most States compulsory. This is placed upon the basis that the welfare of our future must depend upon the intelligence of the citizen. As yet we have not made a reading test a qualification for voting in the States, but it is undoubtedly coming to that in the future.

Our various States look upon education sufficiently important as to make it criminal to keep children from the schools. Yet when we, acting as the Representatives of the people of the entire Nation, attempt to set a reading test for the immigrant who wishes to come to our shores we are at once met with various charges of un-American conduct. I want to say to such that it is more un-American for us to set one test for our own citizen and another for a foreign subject.

This test does not keep out the desirable. If, unfortunately, some otherwise desirable foreigner is excluded because he can not read, the industry that would make him a desirable citizen of this country will enable him to get ready for the test. As I have said before and as has been stated by the Member from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], it will but defer the time if he is such as we wish to admit. We have sections in our own country where 50 per cent of the illiteracy was removed in five years.

Believing, as I do, in the protection of American labor against the competition of cheap European labor, a principle for which I have always stood and for which I still stand, I can not consistently vote against raising the standard of intelligence of the immigrant who comes here to compete with our labor of higher standards. I do not mean to exclude the foreigner, but, rather, to raise the standard of the immigrant. Whatever may be proposed upon this floor by the opponents of this test, it must be admitted by all candid minds that ignorant workingmen will increase the labor problems of the country. The German industrial expert makes sport of our country's policy in attempting to utilize the cheap foreign labor in competition with our American labor. It has small effect in the higher grades of skilled workmanship, but in the lower skills it produces the situation in Lawrence and elsewhere in the zones of labor dis-Men in the heat of debate are apt to make unwarranted declarations. This test is not in the interest of any sect or religion, neither is it against any sect or religion. I would not vote for a measure that results from any religious or antireligious propaganda. The time for religious persecution is past, and I sincerely trust the time for religious jealousies will also soon pass away, if they have not already done so. Neither is this measure written against any particular race because of any prejudice of whatever character.

It is simply, as I understand it, in the interest of a higher class of immigrants, in the interest of our own Nation in the future.

An undesirable individual, no matter what his race, his color, or his religion, should be prevented from coming here. While no test is sufficient to cover all undesirables, it must be admitted that education will assist in this selection. If it will not, then the history of the progress of the nations in the past is mere It does not appear rational that a citizen of this country could hold seriously that a literacy test will have no effect in producing a better type of immigrant. This does not argue that a person who can not read is not a good citizen; on the contrary, we know a great many who are good citizens. But as a class those who can learn to read are most certainly more desirable than those who can not.

Most certainly no man will argue that a foreigner ignorant of our Government and incapable of gleaning any information from the printed page will be as desirable a citizen as the foreigner who can learn by reading what our Government stands for. And yet this seems to be the trend of the argument of those opposed to the bill.

I am for this test, because we as a Nation have ever been in favor of education, and our greatest battle is against ignorance, both among our native and foreign population.

I am for it because it does not definitely keep out the in-dustrious, the determined, but simply defers the time of their coming.

I am in favor of it because it will keep out the ignorant and thriftless, without energy or industry.

I am for it because it will tend to maintain the American policy of protecting our American labor from the competition of an ignorant European and Asiatic cheap labor.

I am for it because it will through selection produce a better grade of immigrants, who can be more easily assimilated to American ideals.

I am for it because it will not so likely engraft upon American institutions foreign ideals, with all that means to this

I am for it because it will not be so easy to pick up a little Italy or Hungary in Europe and transplant it here to reproduce itself in American soil. We want such immigrants as can comprehend our institutions, as can distinguish between liberty and license, as can appreciate law as against lawlessness.

When our Nation reaches a position that it is dominated by foreign-born people not acclimated to our ideals, then the order has been reversed; instead of our Americanizing them, we have been foreignized by them, a consummation that must be feared in some of our cities already. When we have reached that point we are not doing our duty either to our own citizens or to the immigrant who refuses to be an American after he reaches us, save by record of the courts.

The educational test is right. It is demanded by our own people, native as well as foreign born, and I shall therefore vote for it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, to be practical for just a moment, the demand for this literary test comes mainly from the part of the country that knows least of the foreign brother. If this bill passes, it will pass by the votes of those Members who have the least foreign population within their States. The fact remains that where the foreign population is large the children of foreign-born parents make a better average showing in the schools than the children of the native born. My educated friend from Ohio [Mr. Fess], being a practical teacher, ought to welcome to this country the children of uneducated foreigners who, in acquiring an education, often surpass the children of the native born. [Applause.]

Our President stated in Philadelphia the other day that we ought to revere our ancestors, the people who made this country. Our Speaker stated at the same time that 75 per cent of those people were illiterate. Yet they made the greatest country on earth, and the result of their action has affected every nation on earth in the direction of bettering their condition. That is the result of the earnest work of the illiterates, many of whom were the early settlers of this country. Our President says we should revere our ancestors. He says

I feel that it would be inconsistent with our historical character as a nation if we did not offer a hearty welcome to every honest man and woman who comes to this country to seek a permanent home and opportunity.

[Applause.]

That is the language of our President. This bill would keep out many honest men and women. If the mother of the greatest man that ever lived in this country, Abraham Lincoln, was an immigrant applying for admission at Ellis Island to-day, with this law in force she would be refused admission, and my friend the great educator from Ohio [Mr. Fess] would turn her from the shores that gave Lincoln to this country. He would turn from our shores Joan of Arc, who won the greatest battle for her country, because she could not read or write. Would the gentleman include in the Panama Canal bill a literacy test? Yet the 30,000 men who constructed that great work were mostly foreigners and illiterates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection. Mr. Gordon was recognized.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Ohio is for or against the bill.

Mr. GORDON. I am against it. Mr. BURNETT. I have made the inquiry because I understood the Chair was recognizing gentlemen alternately for and

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to do so, and is doing the best he can.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, if the mother of Abraham Lincoln had been subjected to the literacy test prescribed by this bill as a condition of her continuance in this country, she would have been deported, because she could neither read nor write in any language, and yet she was born and lived all her life in this country of free public schools. She was simply unfortunate in being the child of parents who lived on the frontier, where schools were inaccessible.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. That was in 1809. This is 1914-over 100 years later.

Mr. GORDON. That makes no difference.

Mr. COADY. Are not the principles of 1809 the same as 1914?

Mr. GORDON. Of course, principles do not change. Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose of bearing witness on this question, because I was born and raised in a community largely settled by foreigners, the majority of whom, if subjected to this test, I dare say, would have been excluded. They came to this country from Europe and settled in northwestern Ohio in the Black Swamp, and they cut down the timber, cleared, drained, and cultivated the lands, and have made, by their industry and toil, that country the richest farming community on the face of the globe.

I knew these people intimately and well; I attended school with their children. These children to-day are, many of them, among the leading citizens of northwestern Ohio. It seems to me that the gentlemen who are pressing the literacy test upon this bill have not fully considered the consequence of what they are doing. Our brethren of the South, who have no foreign born among them to speak of, come here and vote upon this question without any actual knowledge concerning these people. Where is the sentiment in favor of the literacy test? We hear gentlemen from the rural districts, like the one represented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess], who spoke a few moments ago, sympathizing with the cities. He himself is a resident of the country. Now, I am a resident of the largest county in Ohio, the one which has the largest proportion of foreign born of any in the State.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. No; I will come to the gentleman's case in a minute. [Laughter.] I say, I come from a county that has the largest proportion of foreign-born population of any in the State. Illiteracy! Where is the illiteracy in the United States Why, it is among the oldest inhabitants of the country, down there in the mountain districts of the South. There are families down there over 150 years old, who can trace their ancestors back that far, the most illiterate white people in the United States to-day.

This bill does not attempt to deal with the naturalization laws in a single particular; it merely prescribes additional conditions upon those who, without any choice of their own in the matter, were born elsewhere and who may wish to improve their condition by acquiring a home somewhere within the territory of

By reason of the peculiar character of our free institutions it has become the settled policy of the United States to exclude by law from admission to our territory persons afflicted with a contagious or infectious disease, idiots, imbeciles, insane, and feeble-minded, persons likely to become a public charge, persons who have been convicted of crime involving moral turpitude, who have been convicted of crime involving motal tarpitude, those who advocate the commission of crime against persons and property or organized society, and those who come here pursuant to contract with or by virtue of pecuniary inducements offered by others, and those who by reason of inherent racial causes are incapable of amalgamation with the white race without injury to both, and who for this reason are rendered ineligible to naturalization under the laws of the United States.

Although we are the only Nation on earth, I believe, which has enacted this legislation, it has become our settled policy, and there is no substantial sentiment in this country favoring a material change by repealing any of the existing laws restricting immigration.

But this literacy test is a new departure from our past and existing policy; it prohibits from landing on our shores and authorizes the forcible deportation by the strong arm of the law of persons who may be sound and healthy in body, mind, and morals, who may be honest and industrious, but who, by reason of the lack of opportunity in the country in which they were born and reared, are unable to read correctly a 40-word thesis.

There is an exception in the bill which can not be justified on any theory of the advocates of the literacy test. Its proponents contend that they are not influenced in any degree by class prejudice or the accident of place of birth, but solely by a desire to protect the people already here from the results of coming in contact with persons who are excluded; and yet it is proposed to exempt from this literacy test those who come here solely as a result of religious persecution, although they may be unable to read a single word in any language. If this test is proposed exclusively for the benefit of those already here, and is necessary for their defense and protection, why open the door to those who are beyond our jurisdiction and entitled, under the theory of those who have formulated this test, to no consideration at the hands of Congress in framing this legislation? This very exception exposes the inherent weakness in the logic of those who advocate a literacy test.

The only real original Americans are the Indians, and our American civilization is rapidly ruining them; but among the people of this country, since the repeal of the laws of primogeniture and entail by and through Jefferson, it has become a common saying, almost a maxim, that "there are but three generations between shirt sleeves and shirt sleeves," and this rule applies equally to all persons, regardless of their place of

It might well be argued that, if this "literacy test" is made a condition precedent to the right of coming to this country, it ought to be applied to those already here, who have for years had free access to our public schools; and yet, if the people of the mountain districts of the South were subjected to this test, it would almost depopulate that section of the country. Twentytwo and one-half per cent of the population of the tenth district of Kentucky, 10 years old and over, are unable to read or write. Permit me to call your attention to some of the census returns of 1910 from four congressional districts in the United States: The tenth Kentucky, represented by Mr. Langley; the second Tennessee, represented by Mr. Austin; the sixth Ohio, represented by Mr. Fess; and the twentieth Ohio, represented by myself.

The number of persons out of each 100 10 years old and over in these four districts who can neither read nor write is as

Twentieth Ohio_____

Yet in these returns are included all foreign-born persons over 10 years of age, of which there were in the twentieth district of Ohio, 77,167; in the sixth Ohio, 3,219; second Tennessee, 1,667; and tenth Kentucky, 187. In my district the foreignborn number nearly one-half as many as the natives-160,890while in the other three districts the total number of foreign born is but 5,073, or less than one-fifteenth of the number in the twentieth district of Ohio alone.

It is true that great portions of the South are still suffering from the effects of the destruction and devastation of the Civil War and the theft and vandalism of the reconstruction period, but not these mountain counties. They were almost universally on the Union side and welcomed the northern armies as deliverers, and not as invaders; their soil and people were too poor to attract the cupidity of the carpetbagger; and the fact that almost the entire population of these mountain counties who are old enough are either on the pension rolls or trying to get there is proof that they never shared the political views and were never subjected to the discrimination suffered by the great mass of the southern white people.

What these figures prove is that education does not depend upon the place of birth but upon means of communication with and access to schools and the means and methods of education. In these two mountain districts of Kentucky and Tennessee the population is almost entirely native-born whites, but it is scattered over the mountain sides, making travel to and from school difficult and even dangerous and the cost of maintaining schools very expensive in proportion to population. They certainly do not prove that children of foreign birth and parentage are less able to learn with the same opportunity than are those born in this country. On the contrary, returns made up from the census reports appear to indicate that much more rapid progress is made by children of foreign birth or parentage, but this is probably due to the fact that with less knowledge and familiarity with our language and places of amusement more time is devoted to school work, and this more than overcomes the handicap imposed upon them by constant contact and communication with their parents whose knowledge and information concerning our language and institutions may be and generally is limited.

Literacy! It seems to me that my friends on the Democratic side ought to consider this question more fully. You ought to remember what has been the historic policy of the Democratic Party ever since it was organized and not force this thing upon your Democratic brethren.

There are so many things to be said against this proposition that one hardly knows where to start. I say it is no proper test to impose upon immigration. You will exclude sober, honest, industrious, sound, healthy men and women; those are the people who helped to make this country what it is. It seems to me, gentlemen on the Democratic side, that you ought to pause and heed and consider some of the things that have been said in this debate on this question. You ought to weigh the testimony of those who come from the parts of the country where these people against whom you are inveighing live and move and have their being. It seems to me that if you give this matter careful and honest consideration you will vote down this literacy test on the roll call. [Applause.]
Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gospon]. He said, "We ought to keep in mind the principles of the Democratic Party." The founder of the Democratic Party ought to be good authority, and he said, "While we are providing for the fortification of our country against a foreign fee, I am in favor of fortifying it against the influx of undesirable immigration." [Applause.]

We are making no fight upon the forefathers who came to this country. They have wrought mightily for us and our country. My great-grandfather came over to this country a long time ago. Those of us who are here are charged with the responsibility of supporting the institutions of this country and of protecting this Nation from the dangers of indiscriminate and unrestricted immigration. Our duties and responsibilities in this regard are great. Let us give intelligent attention to the kind of people who are to come here in the future. Too many of the undesirable and injurious element are coming in now. Criminals of every character are coming over every year. And, Mr. Chairman, the time has come to show our good sense and patriotism by looking to the future welfare of our country. Give our own people a chance. The children born of the men and women already in our country will marry and keep up the standard of living and citizenship and fulfill the Scripture, which says: "Multiply and replenish the earth." [Applause.]
Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Would a motion now be in order to move to strike out the last two words?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not.
Mr. DONOVAN. Would the Chairman state how the gentleman from Alabama obtained the floor by striking out one word? I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first answer the parlia-mentary inquiry of the gentleman from Connecticut. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle] offered an amendment. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Heflin] offered an amendment to the amendment. It is not now in order to offer an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it, Mr. DONOVAN. Would it be in order to rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. It would, and the Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] for that

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my contention is that morality, integrity, sobriety, frugality, industry, obedience to law, willingness to work-everything that makes a man-ought to be the test of admission to our shores. My contention is that the man who makes the sewers and lays the water mains in our great cities performs a more important function to society than the man who runs the bank. The man who builds the sewers provides the sanitation which enables us to live in perfect health, while the man who runs the banks preys upon the necessities of the people. Educational qualifications have nothing whatever to do with any of the things I have coumerated. A man may have been born in such unfortunate surroundings that it was impossible for him to obtain an education; and are we on that account to ostracize him, prevent him and his children from enjoying the blessings of liberty? I hope not. Every man with a clean mind and an honest heart who is willing to work and create wealth and obey our laws ought to be permitted to become a citizen of the United States. I can well remember as a boy when every man who did the laboring work in our community was an Irishman. Their sons and daughters attended the public schools. After attendance upon the public schools, they went into the other activities. They became bankers, law-yers, doctors, and merchants, and they became the most useful people in America. Following them came the Germans. same processes of evolution took place with them, and their children to-day are among the most influential and patriotic men and women in the life of the country.

Following them came the Swedes, and the same process of evolution took place in their families, and their boys and girls to-day are among the most valuable citizens we have. Then came the Poles, and their children attended our public schools, and this same process of evolution took place, and to-day they are counted among our lawyers, merchants, manufacturers, and bankers, and they exert a potential influence on the life of the Nation. Nobody will dare to say they are not patriotic citizens. Following them came the Austrians, and the same process of evolution took place with them. Then came the north Italians, the Bohemians, Lithuanians, and Hungarians, and the same process of evolution has taken place with them, and to-day we are allowing the south Italians to come, and my hope and belief is that the same process of evolution will take place as to their children. And so I say that this test of an educational qualification as to the fitness of the man to become a citizen of the United States is not only unjust but it is mislending. No: we need have no fear; they will learn to love our institutions and will fight to defend them if need be. Let them come. I can not bring my conscience to believe that we ought to apply such a test as this to determine the fitness of any man for admission to our shores. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD:

"Insert after the semicolon, in line 20, page 8, the following: 'All aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who have resided therein continuously for five years, and who have, in accordance with the law, declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States, and who will return to the United States within six months from the date of their departure therefrom.'"

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order this is out of order and that all debate has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not apply to the right of a Member to offer an amendment to an amendment, which the Chairman understands the gentleman does.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood the gentleman from Alabama to offer an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman also withdrew the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. There is where he made a mistake, then. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is not the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] to strike out the paragraph, and, of course, it is not an amendment to the amendment, but it is an amendment to perfect the text. The CHAIRMAN. In any event-

Mr. MANN. In any event it is in order as an amendment to perfect the text, and an amendment to perfect the text is subject to another amendment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it. Mr. GOLDFOGLE. We could not hear over here and I want to know whether the gentleman from Wisconsin offers that as an amendment to my amendment or whether he offers it merely as an amendment to perfect the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers it as an amendment to the amendment, but the Chair thinks it is an amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. GARDNER. If the Chair pleases, the amendment is introduced as a perfecting amendment to the text of the bill which the gentleman seeks to strike out, and I submit to the Chair it is well worthy of consideration whether the time for debate has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, unquestionably the time for debate on the amendment of the gentleman from New York has expired, but the Chair does not think that would prevent the offering of an amendment to perfect the text of the bill, as the committee would not desire to vote on the amendment of the gentleman from New York until the text of the section had been perfected.

Mr. GARDNER. If the Chair pleases, I was suggesting not that the amendment was not in order, but that debate on the amendment was not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the only debate which has been closed is the debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and any other amendment of course is subject to Mr. GARDNER. Well, Mr. Chairman, of course that would probably necessitate somebody moving to close debate on the whole paragraph.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on the entire paragraph.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. My point of order is that the gentleman from Alabama can not in this way take the gentleman from Wisconsin off the floor. The gentleman from Wisconsin was recognized by the Chair to offer an amendment and was about to proceed to argue the amendment when the gentleman from Alabama made his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] is entitled to the floor, as the gentleman had begun to debate his amendment, and the Chair, therefore, recognizes the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this amendment is along the lines of the one that was offered to the first section of the bill on Saturday, but it meets the objection that was offered by some of the opponents of that amendment, in that it exempts from the literacy test only those who have heretofore been lawfully admitted to the United States and who have resided therein for five continuous years and who have in accordance with law declared their intention of becoming citizens and who return to this country within six months from the date of their departure.

I can not conceive how any person, unless he is an absolute prohibitionist of all immigrants and wishes this country to be nothing but America for Americans, would object to the provisions of this amendment. We know that there have been hundreds of thousands of worthy immigrants in this country who have permanent homes here and who on occasions wish to visit relatives abroad, perhaps to pay a last visit to their relatives on their deathbed. This provision will only seek to give those who are bona fide residents of this country the privilege of going back and returning within six months without being threatened with the danger of being excluded by reason of the literacy test.

Now, it has been fundamental in the international law of this country that when an alien came over to this country and declared his intention of becoming a citizen he separated himself from his native government and that we threw a protecting arm over that alien upon his declaring his intention to become What objection now can be raised to those who have been lawfully admitted on their return from a brief sojourn abroad to being relieved from this literacy test? I hope the gentlemen on the other side, even those of you who are in favor of this strict provision of providing a literacy test, will accept this provision so as to permit the hundreds of thousands of good, able-bodied American residents of this country who, perchance, can not in their old age qualify in the rigorous examination for American citizenship, and yet wish to be American citizens, to have the privilege to go to their foreign homes and visit there for at least a period of six months without being threatened with exclusion by the literacy test.

In the last Congress it was the unanimous vote of this House that the Jews of this country, when they had passports, should have those passports recognized by Russia. We issue a limited passport under a law passed some six or eight years ago to any person who had declared his intention to become a citizen, which is recognized in any country except the country of nativity. I am only asking you to carry out the American idea and give these foreigners who have domiciles and residences here the privilege of going abroad and of returning without being subjected to a literacy test whereby they may fail to read some word or words or give an acceptable definition or explanation of them, and thereby be excluded from returning to the country of their adoption. I hope this amendment will to the country of their adoption. I hope this amendment w have the unanimous support of this committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-NETT] moves that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto now close

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 86.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] took their place as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported-ayes 82, noes 104,

So the motion was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Langley].

Mr. Langley. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of opposing the pending amendment. I am in favor of the paragraph as it stands. I voted against closing debate a few moments ago, however, although the motion was made by the gentleman in charge of the bill. I did this because I regard this particular paragraph as embodying one of the most vital questions that has been considered in this Congress, and I am in favor of giving gentlemen on the other side of it full opportunity to be heard. It is a two-sided question, gentlemen, and we must concede that there is force in some of the arguments that are being presented against it. There is one thing that I am glad of, and that is that it is being treated as a nonpartisan measure, and I beg to suggest that perhaps the country might have been better off if such a rule of procedure had been adopted earlier in this Con-[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am as firm a believer as ever in the soundness of the fundamental tenets of the Republican Party, but I have never contended that it is free from error; and I question the eligibility to membership in this House of any gentleman who believes that his party is so constituted. If I were asked to point out what I regard as an error that my party committed while it was in power, I should reply that it was its failure when erecting a tariff wall to restrict the coming in of the products of foreign labor to also erect an immigration wall to restrict the coming in of the man on the job, as the gentleman from Wa hington [Mr. Johnson] would express it.

Mr. Chairman, the jewels of oratory have been quite abundant in this debate, but the jewels of consistency have been rare [Applause.] Some of the extreme protectionists have indeed. been the most vehement in their opposition to this bill. They want the products of foreign labor excluded, but they want the foreigners themselves brought in. On the other hand, some of the most vigorous enemies of protection who want competition with foreign products are just as vigorously opposed to competition with the foreign laborers themselves.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LANGLEY. No; I can not ; ield. I have no enough, even if I do not permit an interruption, to say all that would like to say.

Mr. PLATT. Just one question. Mr. LANGLEY. Well, I will yield to my friend from New York for a short question.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think it inconsistent for Democrats to want us to buy goods abroad and compel people to stay abroad and make them?

Mr. LANGLEY. Well, as to that, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that we do not often find Democrats consistent, anyway, but I will say that I do not think that we should admit either the goods made abroad or the men, women, and children who come here from abroad in greater quantities than we can assimilate with advantage to our own people. should be remembered that most of them who come here cut wages to get a chance to make the goods here; so that the opportunities of our own people for employment are reduced whether the foreigners come here or stay on the other side and send the products of their labor over here. Consistency requires that if we give protection to the man who pays the wages we should also give protection to the man who pays the wages, which means, of course, restriction of imports as well as of immigration. If the one proposition is sound economically, the other is also. I could give many illustrations of the inconsistency of gentlemen on both sides of the House on these two propositions. For example, the gentleman from Missouri [Bartholdt] is an ardent Republican and an orthodox protectionist. He never misses an opportunity to oppose competition with the products of cheap foreign labor, and yet he wants the cheap foreign laborer himself brought in.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is perfectly consistent— Mr. LANGLEY. I think it is the height of inconsistency and that the gentleman is one of the brightest jewels in this crown of inconsistency

Mr. BARTHOLDT (continuing). Because I want to make the newcomer a consumer in this country.

Mr. LANGLEY. Ah, but he becomes a competitive producer as well, and our experience has been that he produces more than he consumes, or, rather, that he takes more employment away from our own people than he furnishes employment to them by reason of what he consumes, and, besides, he must work to get wages to pay for what he consumes; so that we get the worst of it on that score, even if all the immigrants became desirable and ideal citizens of our country. But, Mr. Chairman,

I must decline to yield further.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chalrman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LANGLEY. On the other hand, there is my friend and colleague, Mr. Barkley, the ardency of whose Democracy can not be questioned and who, although a new Member, has already impressed his strong mentality upon this House. He pitched his advocacy of this bill upon his desire to protect the opportunities of his own people against the competition of the foreigner, and yet he is opposed to the doctrine of protection and supported the Underwood tariff bill, which, by increasing imports, has already thrown thousands of our people out of employment and will do the same thing to thousands more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will my colleague yield to me for a ques-

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly, since I have referred to him. Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman know that imports have not increased since the Underwood tariff bill went into operation, and therefore that no one has been thrown out of employment on account of increased imports under that law?

Mr. LANGLEY. I have not the figures before me, and indeed I do not think enough of them are available yet upon which a comparable statement for any considerable period can be based. It is true that the revenues derived from imports since the bill went into effect are less than they were before, because the duties were lowered, but it is my understanding that the value of our imports since the bill became effective is greater than before for the same period. I have not seen the figures, but I have been told that taking the imports and exports for the months of December, 1912, and December, 1913, the balance of trade in our favor for the latter month was forty-five or fifty millions less than it was for the same month in 1912. In other words, we bought more and sold less abroad in last December under your Democratic tariff than we did during the preceding December under a Republican tariff, and that must mean diminishing employment and decreasing prosperity for our own people. But my friend and I will have an opportunity to discuss that more fully and more accurately at a later date.

Mr. Chairman, these inconsistencies to which I have been referring constitute, to my mind, a political paradox that I am unable to fathom. [Laughter.]

It was once the boasted shibboleth of a great party that "the gates of Castle Garden swing inward." Then it was pointed to as an evidence of prosperity, but the gates have swung so far inward and so wide as to create a national menace that calls Instead of proving national prosperity for a drastic remedy. as it did then, it now threatens denationalization. mous increase of immigration in recent years has already been fully discussed in this debate, and I would not go over the ground again even if my time permitted. A friend of mine who recently visited New York City, and who has made some investigation of this question, tells me that there appear to be more Jews there than there ever were in Jerusalem, aye, even in Palestine, in the days when that God-favored people were at the zenith of their ancient glory, and more Italians than there were in Rome when the Roman legions were conquerors of the earth. I do not mean to leave the inference that they are not all good citizens, but I mention this as an evidence of how liberal our Government has been upon this question of immigration and of the growing importance of it to our people.

It has been repeatedly charged in this debate that the gentieman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and his followers are actuated by motives that are anything but patriotic and that they are seeking to force this measure through by appeals to prejudice. Mr. Chairman, I can not persuade myself into the belief that a monopoly of patriotism and pure, impartial motives is enjoyed by gentlemen whose districts include immigration ports or large cities or other territory where the foreign vote predominates or is potent, or who for other manifest reasons share the sentiments of that class of voters. Why not let us be perfectly frank and fair with one another and concede that, primarily, each of us is endeavoring to carry out the wishes and promote the interests of his constituents?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky

has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will permit me to proceed for two or three minutes longer. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Lang-

LEY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is

There was no objection.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I freely admit that I want these restrictions because a large majority of the people of my district want them and because I believe it will be to their interest to have them, and I concede the same high purpose to those who oppose the bill.

I hope I do not underestimate the weight of the arguments I was greatly impressed with the eloquent on the other side. appeal of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle] and the fervent words of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I have listened with interest and profit to the arguments of many other gentlemen on that side of the question, but I remain unconvinced, for I still believe that, everything considered, the literacy test is the wisest and most effective method of dealing with the serious situation that confronts us.

Many gentlemen opposed to this bill have contended that there is no demand for such legislation, but none of them have undertaken to explain why, if that be true, that there is such an overwhelming majority of this great body, fresh from the people, in favor of it. My observation has uniformly been that when such a situation exists it is responsive to the demands of the

That this literacy test will work hardships in individual cases, and will sometimes exclude those who would make desirable citizens, must be admitted; but we must also remember that oftentimes in the administration of the affairs of government such considerations must give way to the higher one of national expediency.

Of course, I had rather admit an illiterate patriot than an educated anarchist or disturber, and I wish it were practicable to segregate them on that basis, but it is not.

I would not in the least disparage the good influences that have been wrought by, nor minimize the deeds of valor and of patriotism that are recorded in the history of, the achievements of many of our foreign-born citizens. Many of them have written their names high upon the Nation's honor roll. All honor to these and thrice welcome to those yet to come whose histories in their native lands give promise of such achievements here.

These are not the ones we seek to exclude, but rather those who come not here to stay, who have no sympathy with our institutions, who do not cherish and can not learn to cherish the sacred traditions of the Republic, who do not love and honor its flag, and who can not feel or comprehend the emotions in the bosom of the poet, when he wrote:

Breathes there the man with soul so dead Who never to himself hath said, This is my own, my native land!

[Applause.] The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in reference to the literacy test in this bill. that there is not a Member of this House who is willing to pull down the bars and to say that every man born in a country outside of our own shall be permitted to come into the United States. I think every gentleman on this floor, whether he is opposed or not to this particular bill, is in favor of keeping up the bars to some extent. Therefore the argument does not go that we should open our arms and receive people from all over the world regardless of their condition. I suppose there is not a gentleman on this floor who would repeal the law that to-day excludes criminals from admission into our country, or who would repeal the law that excludes insane persons. In other words, when you are willing to exclude insane persons and criminals you admit that a line should be drawn somewhere to protect our own people against dangerous immigration.

This literacy test is not directed against any nation or any race of people. The people of any country, condition, or nativity may come into this country if they can measure up to the test, and it is not a severe test. It does not say that they must read our language, but that they must read some language, of their own country or some other country. Now, why should the literacy test be a protection to American standards? And that is what we want. We want to maintain the standard of American living, American life, and American homes. Is there a man on the floor of this House who is willing to pull down the American standard of life, living, and home? Not one. I am willing to answer the question for you all.

Then, does this literacy test help you in that respect? It certainly does. In your States to-day you are spending millions upon millions of dollars to educate the children of this land to hold up American standards of life and living. Only a few weeks ago this Congress passed a bill carrying a number of millions of dollars to promote education among our farming classes. Then, if you admit that education is one of the standards that must be maintained, why should you welcome immigrants who are not up to your standard of education and your standard of life in that respect any more than you would welcome the criminal or insane who are not up to the standards of our mental and moral life?

The statistics can not be denied. I saw in one of these reports a statement that has not been contradicted, made by Mr. Frederick A. Pope, the prosecuting attorney for Somerset County, N. J. And this is only one of many statements that I have read on the subject. He says that of 54 crimes by foreigners that involved violence, 46 of them were committed by illiterates

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANAHAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes, so that he can answer

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very kindly, but I do not care to answer the gentleman's questions.

Mr. ADAIR. I object, Mr. Chairman. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I welcome the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] into the ranks of those who want to maintain the American standard of living. He is the distinguished author of the existing tariff law, which some of us believe has brought the American standard into jeopardy during the past year, if it has not turned thousands of honest American workingmen out of their jobs. I welcome him as an advocate of a higher wage standard here, even though he opposes the admission of foreign labor into the United States; but, great student of economics that he is, he falls into the error that some others have fallen into during this debate, of being unable to distinguish the difference between the foreign flesh and blood that comes into the United States to work at an American wage and the foreign goods, made in foreign lands at a foreign wage, that come into the United States to compete with the goods made by the men here who work for an American wage. [Applause on the Republican side.]
Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE. I am sorry to say I can not.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield to a point of

I yield to a point of order. I will have to. Mr. GARDNER. I make the point of order that the debate on this amendment is exhausted, there having been five minutes in favor and five minutes against the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to hold that debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. MOORE.

Mr. GARDNER. That is an amendment in the third degree. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think so. The gentleman from Wisconsin offered an amendment to the text of the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] offers an amendment to the amendment. The Chair thinks that is in

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, this is the crux of the situa-tion: When the foreign laborer, who has been working abroad on foreign standards at the foreign wage, enters the United States to work under American conditions at the American wage he is advancing to a higher standard of living without lowering the American standard. We are thus aiding him without injuring ourselves. An evidence of this may be had from the hearings, and the testimony of one so well posted as the secretary of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Morrison, who refers to it on page 302 of the hearings.

I had been asking Mr. Morrison about the wages paid the 200,000 organized garment workers, who are mostly of foreign birth, and the 400,000 organized mine workers, mostly of foreign birth, when this colloquy took place:

Mr. Moore. You concede that these men and women, when organized in the United States, do work for an American wage, the best that can be obtained in this country.

Mr. Morrison. The best that can be obtained in this country.

Mr. Moore. And they do not work for the low foreign wage, such as is paid in Great Britain, Germany, Belgium, or Italy?

Mr. Morrison. There is no question about that. We not only concede that, but we admit it.

There is the testimony of your best witness, the secretary of the American Federation of Labor, who tells you that he is as much of a protectionist as I am when he admits that those who come from foreign shores, although he now seeks to keep them out, come to the United States, work at an American wage, the best that is to be obtained in this country, and that they do not work at one-third or one-half the American wage, as they would if they remained abroad. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in the last and final analysis the question of immigration is the question of citizenship. It is a question of perpetuating American ideals and of the perpetuity of free government. That this is so is evidenced by the fact that we are all practically in agreement in regard to these provisions of the bill which seek to exclude immigrants clearly objectionable in character. When we get beyond these clauses, more or less clearly defined, we find a disagreement or difference of opinion. Does anyone believe that these provisions relating to so-called undesirables will keep from our shores all of those whose presence accentuate and increase our problems? I believe no one will claim that they will, and yet when we offer a literacy test gentlemen insist that while it is true that the clauses that exclude so-called undesirables are not sufficient, this test we propose is not a wise one. We admit that it is not a perfect test, but no better test has been proposed by anyone. I regret it may exclude some well-meaning and well-intentioned people, and that under it the educated rascal may still come into our country, but it will at least exclude a large number of those who, by reason of a lack of education, are unable to acquire that knowledge which the immigrant ought to have, which he must have, to understand our institutions and to realize his responsibility as an American citizen.

I have such a high appreciation of the efficacy of the institutions and the air of freedom in molding the character of men that even with the large illiterate immigration we are now receiving, largely from regions where the people have never had any training in a free government, we could still assimilate this large immigration if the immigrants were being generally spread out and diffused among the body of our people. But the fact is that many of these unprepared immigrants are concentrated in certain districts, themselves not yet fully assimilated, thus cutting them off from the opportunities which contact with American citizens would give them to learn of the character of our institutions and their responsibilities under our form of gov-

Year after year a larger proportion of these new immigrants are remaining in localities now largely non-American. There is little opportunity given them to learn from the printed page the character of our Government or their duties to it. The fact of their illiteracy prevents them from getting out among our people and thus acquiring by precept and example knowledge of these things. These illiterate people, no matter how well-meaning they may be, are by reason of their lack of education the easy prey of knaves, native and foreign. We do now, as we always have, desire to afford an asylum and opportunity for all honest industrious white people who want to come, but until we can get a better test than the literacy test I am in favor of that as the best yet offered.

Mr. WALLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Wallin, offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "act," in line 14, page 7, add the following:
"Provided, That all allens seeking admission to the United States under the restrictions herein set forth shall furnish to the immigration authorities of the United States a certificate duly verified by a judicial or police authority in the city, province, or country from which they may come or where they resided that they have never been convicted of any crime; also a certificate duly verified from a health officer or other properly constituted authority that they or any member of their immediate families have never been afflicted with insanity in any form."

Mr. WALLIN. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I am not in a critical or hypercritical frame of mind. I believe with the committee and the evident majority in this House that restriction of immigration is necessary and should be enacted. However, I do not believe that the restrictions called for in this bill and in the committee amendments, which to my mind strengthen it to some extent, are just the restrictions we seek and which the people at large believe they will secure through the enactment of this measure.

The principal restrictions which are new are those of the literacy test and a perfunctory examination of intending immigrants at their point of sailing by physicians appointed for that purpose, who, if they suspect anything wrong with any person, may examine him and will be obliged to take his word for family history and personal fitness, provided that at the moment of examination, no matter how carefully made, it re-

Then, too, the literacy test is no test at all, except that it develops the fact that the immigrant can read a little and write a little; whether he can think or reason or has an idea of the general qualifications of a citizen seems to have no bearing in this bill. What his previous history is as to honesty and right living is left for himself to tell, and he is sent on his journey if he can write 20 or 30 words in any language he desires from a card on which his copy is set and sign his name thereto. All persons who are supposed, by their professions, to be educated are admitted without restriction, and the man who can meet the requirements of the proposed card system can also enter, all qualifications being met. Is it not true that the greatest criminals, the most undesirable people, are better prepared to meet this test, because their avocation has taught them the necessity for educational equipment? The bar is up against an honest, sober, industrious workman who seeks the broad and open fields of this country, but the undesirable who can put his name and 20 or 30 words on paper is allowed to land because he possesses the supposed advantage of "literacy."

However, the purpose of this amendment is not to remedy a defect which I see in this bill, but to insure to the United States, as far as possible, that no criminally or physically or mentally unfit person comes to our shores except that we have exhausted every reasonable precaution to prevent it, which this bill in its present form does not do. It will be no great hardship on the intending immigrant to secure the certificates of character and sanity called for by this amendment. It will do away with the personal element which enters into these examinations, where the provocation is to deny what can not be shown on the spot, and it will tend to lighten the expense of the State and the Nation, who are forced to care for thousands of these unfortunates, allowed to enter because of the fact that at the moment of their landing an examination did not reveal the tendency or the disease which afterwards developed itself along criminal or physical or mental lines.

Much of the report of this honorable committee which places this bill in our hands is devoted to the report of the commission which has studied this question and which, the committee believes, is an indorsement for this measure. But is it as the bill is drawn? The report also includes an article from the New York Times of March 28, 1912, which seems to me to be a most important argument in favor of the amendment which I offer.

Among other things, it says:

Among other things, it says:

The Times is informed by Secretary McGarr, of the State commission in lunacy, that of the 31,432 insane patients under treatment in the 14 State hospitals on February 10 last 13,163, or 41.9 per cent, were aliens. Foreign-born patients have increased since the Federal census of December 31, 1903, by 1,552, or 13.4 per cent. In the 2 State hospitals for the criminal insane there were 1,230 patients on February 10, of whom nearly 44.4 per cent were of alien birth. The Federal census of 1910 showed a percentage of aliens to total population in this State of 29.9 per cent.

The prevalence of insanity among immigrants is evidently much greater than among the native born. Of the 5,700 patients admitted to the civil hospitals for the year ending September 30, 1911, 2,737, or 48 per cent, were aliens, and 1,481, or 26 per cent, were of native stock. Of the whole number the nativity of but 218, which is 3.8 per cent, was not ascertainable. Insanity among the foreign people of this city occurs in a still larger percentage of cases. Of the first admissions to the hospitals 2,006 out of 3,221 residents of the city were of freign birth; that is, 64.1 per cent, although the foreign-born population is but 40.4 per cent of the whole.

It will be argued by the defenders of this bill that the cause

It will be argued by the defenders of this bill that the cause of this situation, which has already cost the State of New York

$4,000,000 to care for the alien insane, is the result of negligence in the examination of intending immigrants by the steamship companies. There is no question that this argument is based on fact, but I believe that even an examination by the Government's own physicians, either at the port of sailing or at the port of debarkation, will not reveal the hidden or hereditary disease in all cases, nor will it reveal the criminal tendency of the immigrant, if he has one, if the story of his past life is to be based upon his own account, without verification from those in official position who know the facts.

That this is a necessary precaution is attested by the fact that on January 1, 1910, there were 20,970 foreign-born prisoners out of the 136,472 persons incarcerated in the penal tions of the country, and during that year out of 493,434 committals to those institutions 98,532 were foreign born. large class of criminals, hereditary or otherwise, evaded both the steamship and the Government inspectors and landed on the soil of this country principally, I believe, because the law and the practice enabled them to conceal, willfully in most cases, the fact that they were not desirables.

These are the conditions which will be lessened, if not cured. by the amendment which I offer, and for this reason I ask that

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be permitted to proceed for five minutes more, because I think there are some gentlemen in the Chamber who would like to ask him a question or two about his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be granted five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I object.
Mr. BELL of California. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of this bill as it stands. [Applause.] I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches made by the gentlemen on both sides of this question, and I have been impressed with the earnestness which has characterized their remarks.

While the arguments have been directed to the literacy test, my impression is that the efforts of those opposed to the passage of this bill have been directed not so much against this qualification as they have been in favor of unrestricted immigration.

The people of the State of California and the entire Pacific coast are vitally interested in this question. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnerr] has warned us of the influx of the peons from Mexico, and we have with us at the present time the very disturbing Asiatic question, and these immigration problems will be accentuated by the opening of the Panama

We are now reliably informed that the steamship companies are selling 500,000 tickets on the installment plan, and southern California will be a mecca for thousands of these people from the Mediterranean who are unable to pay for a steerage passage in any other way. Our State has realized the seriousness of this situation, and our last legislature enacted a law creating a commission to try to meet this unusual and trying condition which will confront us upon the opening of the Panama Canal. The people of my State are asking that we shall have a little less in quantity and a little more in quality, and we have endeavored in this manner to meet the immigrants that may come to our State and try to serve them and train them in the American spirit.

The literacy test provided in this bill will tend not only to restrict immigration, but will give us better material upon which to work.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill, and would be in favor of even more stringent restrictions than this measure provides. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, human rights do not rest upon education or the advantages of opportunity, but upon the broad principle of the equality of all mankind.

I am in full accord with the objects of this bill, but I am opposed to its principle of exclusion. I believe the time has come for restriction of immigration, but I am opposed to a test in violation of the fundamental principles of free institutions. [Applause.] I am opposed to a recognition of human rights upon any basis of title, station, or advantage of opportunity. I want a test of natural merit upon the principles of human equality, without regard to title, station, or opportunity in life. I am in favor of the test of honesty; I am in favor of a test of character; I am in favor of a test of morality; I am in favor of a test of mental vigor; I am in favor of a test of brawn and sinew; I am in favor of a test of a sound mind and a healthy body; I am in favor of a test of honest motives and a laudible ambition; I am in favor of a test of industry, enterprise, and thrift; I am in favor of a test of bona fide citizenship; I am in favor of a test of devotion to home and wife and children; I am in favor of a test of patriotism and loyalty to our institutions. I stand for a test that will exclude immigrants for want of these and not for the want of an equal opportunity in life. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, while this bill adopts the educational test, it provides, at line 7, page 9, for its suspension for the admission of contract labor to take the place of the man who dares to ask for better working conditions and a living wage. If the educational test is a true test, a true test of merit and manhood, a true test of honesty, a true test of character, a true test of morality, a true test of honest motives and good intentions, a true test of patriotism and loyalty to our institutions, then you are sacrificing all of these upon the altar of commercialism, then you are surrendering all the merits of men for profit, then you are prostituting all the graces of manhood and womanhood for private gain, then you are yielding for money what you deny on conscience, principle, and right. I will go further than the provisions here in the exclusion of immigrants for degeneracy, moral turpitude, and crime, but I refuse to yield inalienable human rights or the principle of equality before the law. [Ap-

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I had not intended to say anything on this bill, because as a matter of fact there is only one provision of this bill that is not now the existing law, and that is the so-called literacy test. The law has been brought forward practically in the bill as it is written with this one addition. This law has passed this House twice, has passed the Senate twice, but something has happened between the House and the Senate or at the White House to prevent it becoming a law. Now, gentlemen of the committee, I think it resolves itself absolutely into one question, and but one. It is absolutely a commercial question, and the people who labor and toil in this country realize fully that it is a question of wages and a question of competition in the life of the wage earner, because when men are competing for the same job you get cheaper labor, but when men who want men to work for them are competing for that labor you can maintain the standard of American wage and you can not do it unless you The men who are the great employers of labor want cheap labor and much immigration. I understand one, a railroad president, in a meeting of business men who were interested in the employment of labor, offered a resolution about 12 months ago in which he proposed that you shall receive from China and Japan and from India the coolie and Hindu labor for the purpose of putting them in various lines of industry on the railroads.

Those men in this country who employ men for a low wage are those men who, when they get a certain unit of work done for a smaller amount of pay than they would otherwise get, are the people who profit by this horde of alien labor which comes to this country, and that is why it was that a short time ago in a labor organization meeting there was passed almost without opposition by the representatives of the American wage earners' organizations a resolution favoring this literacy test. It is a question fairly and simply whether or not the American who lives in this country shall be able to maintain his wage or shall compete with those people who come here from year to year, as the monopolists say, to supply much-needed labor. And, gentlemen of the committee, when you analyze the situation in America you find the men who are behind this movement, controlling the public press, appealing to Congress to prevent legislation of this kind, are the men who are employing labor. They maintain press bureaus for the purpose of denouncing Members of Congress who shall vote for measures for protection of the American wage earner. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] last Saturday evening very tersely, forcibly, and ably gave his reasons for opposing this bill, and I feel called upon at this time to give very briefly, indeed, my reason for changing my vote that was given when this bill was up for consideration before, and why I favor it at this time. [Ap-plause.] Mr. Chairman, vice and crime are weeds that grow in any soil, but they flourish best in the morasses of ignorance. If I am mistaken in this, then every writer who has studied sociology is also mistaken. It has been the experience of ages that hand in hand with progress, with morality, with good government, has gone advance in education. The single individual who comes here, however illiterate he may be, presents no dangers to us, and I would not vote for his exclusion simply on that account, for he may become an excellent and worthy citizen.

But coming here by the thousands and tens of thousands collectively, concentrated into particular districts, these illiterates become, as I think, a menace to our Government and our instibecome, as I think, a menace to our Government and our insti-tutions. And so reluctantly, and very reluctantly, indeed, I have come to the conclusion that I must vote in favor of this bill. I say reluctantly, because I would extend the helping hand to all the oppressed. I believe that we ought to take up the bur-den of civilization so far as the world is concerned, but only so far as we are able. But there are limitations to our ability, Mr. Chairman, and the burden is already becoming, as I believe, greater than we can bear. It must, in justice to ourselves and our children, be reduced, if possible. We have already excluded the criminal, the pauper, and the diseased. We ask simply to carry this sifting process a little further. How many it will exclude, I know not, but I think not too many. We are asking but little. The standard we fix is not high but low; and those who will not in this day and age, this year of progress, come up to this standard, we must in justice to ourselves exclude. [Applause. 1

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bunnerr] in charge of the bill whether or not we can not close debate on this paragraph? I think there has been reasonable debate. Mr. MANAHAN. I think there ought to be as much debate as there is a desire of gentlemen in Congress to debate the question. Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not press that until the gentlemen who have amendments to offer in good faith can offer them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not cut off amendments. cuts off debate. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnerr] that he ask unanimous consent to close general debate on the section in 15 minutes.

Mr. MANAHAN. I will object if that request is made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman states that he will object?

Mr. MANAHAN. No request has been made. I would object if it were made.

Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the Mr. BURNETT. section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. CANTOR. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New The gentleman from New York will

Mr. CANTOR. The chairman of the committee had already.

asked recognition on his motion and was defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnert] to put his motion.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the motion, making the time 45 minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I will make it 20 minutes, Mr. Chairman,

Mr. MOORE. May I not be heard on that motion?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman knows that is not debatable.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. I would like, before the motion is put, to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnerr] that there are many important amendments to this paragraph, and I hope that he will not dispose of it without regard to many other amendments that are desired to be made to it.

Mr. BURNETT. It does not prevent amendments; it prevents debate on the amendments.

Mr. HAYES. If the gentleman will only confine his request to the paragraph, I do not think there will be any objection. Mr. BURNETT. What does the gentleman call the para-

Mr. HAYES. This literacy test.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary question, By what sort of parliamentary practice can the floor be taken from a Member without the point of no quorum being raised?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled on that, and if the gentleman is not satisfied he can appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DONOVAN. I think I am entitled to an answer as to how a Member can lose the floor except by the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman got the floor in time to make his motion to close debate, and therefore the Chair must decline to argue with the gentleman any further. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Will it be in order to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] has offered an amendment, and the Chair was about to put the motion when he was interrupted.

Mr. MOORE. I desire to put before the Chair and the com-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer a substitute.

Mr. MOORE. Then I move as a substitute, Mr. Chairman, that the time be extended until all those who have made requests of the Chair to discuss this literacy test under the fiveminute rule shall have been heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] moves as a substitute that the time on this section and all amendments thereto-

Mr. MOORE. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; not on the section; on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. On the paragraph.

Mr. BURNETT. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that is indefinite.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. MOORE. Then I move to make it an hour. That will fix it definitely

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves, as a substitute to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama Mr. BURNETT] and to the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY], that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in one hour.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GARDNER. What is the meaning of the words "this paragraph" as used by the chairman?

Mr. MOORE. The paragraph affecting the illiteracy test. The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph is in section 3, beginning on page 7, line 19.

Mr. GARDNER. Line 15, is it not? The CHAIRMAN. Line 15; yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And ending on line 24 of page 8?
The CHAIRMAN. No. The paragraph ends on line 15 of page 11. That is the end of the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE. It begins on line 19, Mr. Chairman, on page 7. Mr. GARDNER. If the Chair will permit, the educational test, so called, begins at line 15, on page 7, and ends with the first word in line 24 of page 8.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the paragraph: that is in the middle of it.

Mr. MOORE. It is the paragraph affecting the literacy test.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a paragraph of the bill. It may be a paragraph of the section. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] moves that all debate on the literacy test and all amendments thereto close in one hour as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnett] and that of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAU-NESSY]. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded. All in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. The ayes will be seated, and the noes will rise. [After counting.] hundred and nine gentlemen have arisen in the negative. ayes have it, and the substitute is agreed to. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Manahan] is recognized.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at what has taken place here just now regarding the attempt to close debate in 15 minutes upon this literacy test. I was not surprised when the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] refused to take five minutes' additional time, which I asked for him, that he might answer questions which I desired to put to him; nor was I surprised, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Adair], also an ardent advocate of this intolerant test, objected to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] being given five minutes' more time to defend this the gentleman from Alabama to answer questions-regarding this law indicates that he dare not now take the floor and answer on the very points he attempted to make in this debate.

I commend the shrewdness of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] in objecting to the leader of the Democracy being forced to answer questions upon this literacy test, and I admire also the shrewdness, if not the patriotism, evinced by the chairman in charge of this bill [Mr. Burnert] when he insists on limiting debate to 15 minutes. He would have had no debate at all upon this section if he had had his way. He wanted to shut off general debate on the whole measure after four hours.

shut off general debate on the whole measure after four hours. It is a very obvious thing that they dare not have a full and free discussion of this question of illiteracy. It is an embarrassing subject. Why, the gentleman from Alabama has been in Congress eight years, and still the illiteracy of the State of Alabama is over one-third. As shown by the census of 1900, 14.8 per cent of the native whites of the State of Alabama could not read or write. Even to-day 25 per cent, substantially, of all the people in his State are illiterate.

Why, the arguments that he advanced tempt me to abandon my opposition to this test, because if the illiteracy of a State is opposition to this test, because if the illiteracy of a State is responsible for such a lack of logic and for the narrowness of view which he expressed in the last figures that he gave, then it is an argument that illiteracy is a grave menace to legislative intelligence.

What did he do? He offered figures here from Somerset, N. J., or Pennsylvania, or somewhere else, one isolated community, with no statement as to the make-up of its inhabitants, and he quotes the statistics showing the illiteracy of the men convicted of crime in this town, an unfair way to proceed on a question of this kind and meaning nothing. You can pick out counties in any State in the Union that would show that every crime committed was either, one way or another, by men who could read or could not read, by natives or by foreigners, as the case might be, depending entirely on the population of that particular place.

In my State, where the illiteracy of native whites is only onehalf of 1 per cent, and of all our people only 3 per cent, you could not find any county where any measurable proportion of crime is committed by illiterates. We have not enough illiterates in Minnesota to commit crime. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] submits these figures from Somerset County, N. J., figures which are misleading and mean nothing to a logician, and he expects this House to give credence to those figures because of the exalted position he holds as leader of the majority. So I say that the narrowness of such a point of view, the intolerance shown in shutting off debate, the refusal to answer fair questions, and the lack argument shown all along the line by those who advocate this literacy test almost persuades me that, after all, illiteracy is a rather serious handicap to a legislative constituency. [Applause.]

Of course, Mr. Chairman, there can be no difference of opinion regarding the importance of universal education in a self-governing republic. A healthy national development demands it. My opposition to this law, which lets in all sorts of foreigners who can read a little, but shuts out poor peasants, who never had a chance to learn, does not mean that I deprecate education in social economy. I love our country school system. From the little country school on my father's farm, through the State normal to our great university at Minneapolis, all of my education was in the public schools. To my mind our state-craft and our schools must have interlocking directories. The social welfare and the school system of any State stand side by side, on a high plane or a low plane, as the case may be. Therefore I favor compulsory education and rigid naturalization laws. No foreigner should be naturalized until he has lived with us as a good citizen for five years and can read and understand what he reads. But it is not fair to deny a man a chance to learn how to read, as this law does, by turning him back into the darkness of despotism and despair. Our exclusion laws are We exclude the Asiatic, the anarchist, the rigid enough now. insane and the idiot, the paralytic and the pauper; men who are sick or sore or silly are stopped at our shores. the Commissioner of Immigration shows that during the past year there were excluded on account in sanity, 198; idiocy and imbecility, 72; feeble-minded, 483; diseased (including tubercular), 2,564; defective, 4,208; criminal, 808; immoral 620; contract laborers, 1,624; likely to become a public charge, 7,956.

Only the healthy and the honest men and women who come knocking at our doors are permitted to cross our threshold. The objection of the gentleman from Alabama to answer questions—I will not call it "objection"; I will call it the fear of industrial giants, all concerned will be mutually benefited, and more and more, as the years go by, our roads will be built and our resources developed, our fields tilled and our hungry fed.

The propaganda for this bad bill has not and can not meet the objections we have urged against its un-American spirit, its unsoundness from an economic standpoint, its historic ignorance, heartless and un-Christian selfishness, its shameless inhumanity.

Nothing but fear of subjecting this law to full and fair discussion will explain the unseemly haste with which its nauseating mixture of rotten economics and selfish prejudice has been crammed down the throat of a more or less intimidated Con-They even try to hold our respectable nose as we gulp

Not even so-called business reasons can be urged for this re-What would the so-called wealth of this country be worth if there were no people here? Do not the gentlemen realize that men are the real assets of any nation? We have in our day lost many good men to Canada—about a million people have crossed our northern line since 1896—and our Nation suffered a great loss in their going. But we have gained good men also from Canada and from Europe—some of them almost priceless in value from an economic as well as a moral standpoint. I do not refer to the empire builders and statesmen with whose story all are familiar. Our greatness rests on humbler men, the un-heralded ones, the simpler folk of the lonely places. My State is sturdy and strong in manhood—immigrant manhood, if you

I know an old farmer in the Red River Valley who came over in the steerage from Sweden. He was very poor, but with strong hands and fine courage he subdued wide acres of stubborn soil, built a home, and educated a family of children, winning the confidence and respect of all who knew him. Was this immigrant's value, as an asset of this Nation, measured by the value of his farms or by his money in bank? What was his coprage and patriotism worth? He learned that the great express monopoly of the country was extorting millions from the people, most of whom were poor. His name is in the records of the Nation-Bengt E. Sundberg against The Express Companies. The decision of the commission in this case reducing the rates all over the United States goes into effect on this very day. It will save consumers approximately twenty-five millions a year in carrying charges.

What was this immigrant's courage and patriotism worth to this Nation? You gentlemen of narrow view would have shut the door in the face of this man when he came had you the

And telling this man's story reminds me of his friend and inspiration during that big fight, a man by the name of Loftus. His father was an immigrant from Ireland, his mother from England-and I was about to say he was himself a Scandinavian from Minneapolis. For over 10 years now this selfmade man, George S. Loftus, has led the fight of the reformers of the Northwest against the discriminations and extortions of the railroads, the gambling and price control of the grain combine, and, generally speaking, against the tyranny of the strong over the weak. He fought the Pullman Co. and forced a reduction of its rates in the well-known case of Loftus against Pullman Co. On every public question he has done a man's work. And remember that his immigrant parents were so poor that he had no chance to go to school except a few months as a small child. And yet so informing is the hustling life of every homogeneous community, so enlightening is contact with men of different races with divergent points of view, so stimulating to the mind is the busy mart where races mingle, that this man has attained an address and capacity, an ability to think, and a facility of expression equaled by very few men upon this

When I think of men like Loftus and Sundberg, I confess that I lose patience with the spirit of exclusion which would have denied our country their services as citizens. Surely we have room for more like them in every State in the Union—room and need—so keep down your timid, selfish bars and let them come. "America for men" spells nobility in national conception. "America for Americans" sounds solemn, if selfish, but smells like an ancient corpse.

Several learned gentlemen have boasted of colonial ancestors and hinted that it conferred proprietary rights to this country, but I am not convinced that their title is good. I have not forgotten that many learned and respectable men during those heroic days were Tories, and when I hear men of this generation speak with sneers of our immigrants, as I have in this Chamber, I suspect that during that awful winter while Wash- | directly, the subject of immigration. So that the subject of im-

ington and his soldiery of common men were freezing at Valley Forge, the boasted ancestors, the great grandmothers of my accomplished friends, were waltzing with the British officers in the ballrooms of Philadelphia.

And I wish to remind these "America for Americans" gentlemen that the records in this capital disclose the fact that more than one-half of the men who fought in the American Revolution were men of Irish blood or descent; that the names of nine Irishmen are signed to the Declaration of Independence; that French, German, Polish, and Hungarian officers were the inspiration and guidance of the American forces. Europe is the mother country of America, and the men of Europe have sacred and blood-sealed rights upon our continent.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, aside from the merits of the propositions involved in this bill, I want to take occasion at this time to criticize the political judgment of the gentlemen who have seen fit to foist this bill upon the consideration of Congress and the country at this time. [Applause.] This Democratic administration, the first in 16 years, came into power on a platform pledging the party to remedy certain economic conditions existing in this country, and the platform was absolutely silent on the subject of immigration.

In conformity with our platform pledges we have enacted legislation on the subject of the tariff and the currency; we are about to enact legislation looking to trust regulation; and the great question of railways in Alaska is actively engaging the attention of this Congress and the country now. I respectfully submit to my Democratic friends that if we are interested in the success of the present administration we will confine ourselves in our legislative activity to those subjects upon which our party went before the country on its platform, and we will carry out the pledges we then made to the people, and if, after having done this, any time be left during the present session of Congress, we might then take up measures that were not referred to in the platform of the party. I believe that if we inject the subject of restriction of immigration, particularly by means of an illiteracy test, into our legislative program at this time, the manner in which the country will receive the legislation already enacted on the tariff and the currency, and the manner in which it will receive the legislation about to be enacted on the trusts, and having reference to railways in Alaska, will in large measure be confounded with our immigration problem. I believe that this administration, and the policles upon which it has embarked should be judged by the country fairly and impartially, and that it is unfair to the administration and its policies to inject the subject of immigration into its program at this time.

The foreign-born voter will in all probability regard this emigration bill as an affront to the people of his country, and when he goes to the polls next November he will register his vote as a protest against the immigration policy which we are about to adopt, and the effect, whether beneficial or otherwise, of the legislation we have already enacted and are about to enact on economic subjects will be lost sight of. So I appeal to my Democratic associates to let us proceed to the enactment of legislation looking to the carrying out of our party platform pledges, so that the country can judge of our policies in that regard uninfluenced and unhampered by any extraneous matters.

[Applause.]

I respectfully submit that, however important this matter of restriction of immigration may be, this administration is entitled to be judged by what it has promised the people to do and what it has already done, and that the question of restriction of immigration, in view of our platform pledges and the attitude of the administration upon that subject, is not now before the country and should not now be before this House.

[Applause.]

During the course of the debate on this bill, I have heard some men intimate, or at least try to convey the impression, that they were in the confidence of the administration and that they know what the President will do if this bill should pass. Some have intimated that the President will approve the measure; some have intimated that he will veto it if it passes in its present form. I think, however, that we can safely say, without reference to whether these intimations are correct or incorrect, that the attitude of this administration has been made clear to the Members of the House. On three distinct occasions since the present administration came into power President Wilson appeared in person before joint sessions of the House and Senate, and in plain, well-chosen, and unequivocal terms he conveyed to Congress his views with regard to the subjects upon which he thought it would be wise for the Congress to act, and were of pressing importance to the country. But on none of these occasions did he mention, directly cr indirectly, the subject of impigration. So that the subject of impigration. migration is not only not a part of our legislative program, according to our platform promises to the people, but consideration of that subject was not even invited by the President.

As far as the merits of the bill are concerned, I am heartily in sympathy with the view that immigration ought to be restricted, but I am not prepared to adopt the view that because a man can not read or write, therefore he should not be admitted to this country. The warmest advocates of the restriction of immigration by means of the illiteracy test come from States where illiteracy prevails, unfortunately, to a very great extent, and when this charge was made by Members of the House who come from districts where illiteracy is not so common, I admired the spirit with which Members who represent Southern States responded that the illiteracy which obtains in those sections was due not to unwillingness on the part of the people to secure education but was very largely due, if not entirely, to the disastrous effects of the War between the States. I can very readily understand how the disastrous effects of war have had much to do with depriving men and women of an opportunity to acquire education, and if these conditions obtain for a period of 50 years after a disastrous war, how much more true must these conditions be among peoples who are frequently at war. Europe has been afflicted with several wars since our unfortunate conflict of 50 years ago.

France and Germany have had their strife; Greece and Turkey have had their conflict; England destroyed the South African republics after an exhaustive and devastating war; France and Italy have had their African troubles; our own Nation was obliged to humble the pride of Spain; Japan and Russia waged a very disastrous war upon each other; and the Balkan States are now prostrate and their fields are drenched with the blood of a very recent conflict. And while war was not actually going on in Europe or between Europe and other powers, all the Governments of Europe were wasting the substance of their people in the levying of war taxes, that the Government might be kept in a constant state of military and naval preparedness for war. This almost continuous conflict, and the exactions of European Governments to maintain their state of preparedness for war, has resulted in a great many of the toiling masses of European countries being deprived of an opportunity to secure an education. If we intend to maintain our country as the founders intended it should be maintained, as an asylum for the oppressed, and if European governmental op-pression results in preventing the European of any nationality from an opportunity to secure an education, we ought to determine the fitness of those who seek an asylum on our shores by a standard other than that of an illiteracy test.

In this connection, too, it is well to note the fact that in those portions of our country to which immigration is common, wealth and industry abound; and in those sections of the country to which immigration has not gone, and from which the protest against immigration is loudest, industry and wealth have lagged behind. This outcry against the immigrant has been going on for years. It has been asserted that immigration has a tendency to lower the standard of American wages; to lower the standard of American living; and militates against the progress of American institutions; and theoretically this seems sound, but this theory can not stand in the face of the indisputable fact that our country to-day is richer, more powerful, and more influential among the nations than it ever was before. The standard of American living is higher to-day than it has ever been in the history of the country, and the statistics issued by the Department of Labor show that the tendency of wages is upward and not downward, notwithstanding the fact that immigration has been increasing rapidly in recent years.

In listening to the claim asserted during this debate that immigration is disastrous to the country, I could not avoid re-flecting on the fact that the great State of New York, which ranks first in population, is also first in wealth, and its immigrant population is larger than that of any other State. Pennsylvania ranks second in population, second in wealth, and second in the number of its immigrant population; Illinois ranks third in population, third in wealth, and third in the number of its immigrant population; Ohio comes fourth in population. fourth in wealth, and it has a large foreign population. And so it is all down the row of States; wealth, population, and immigration seem to go hand in hand. When we come to the great State of Alabama we find it is eighteenth in population. its immigrant population is less than 1 per cent of its total, and it ranks twenty-seventh in the score of wealth. We should not be influenced against the immigrant by a prejudice or a fear. The honest, intelligent, and industrious immigrant is a producer of wealth and is by no means a danger to our institu-tions; and, while he may be illiterate, our experience in the past has demonstrated that the children of immigrants cheerfully take advantage of our free educational institutions and have developed into the brightest, most capable, influential, and patriotic citizens of the Republic.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the speech made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gordon], I wish to speak during the time at my disposal. The gentleman from Ohio reproaches the Members from the South because they have not thoroughly and fully considered this proposed legislation. Seven years ago Congress created a commission of nine Members, seven of whom were from the northern and western sections of the country-Senator Lodge, of Massachusetts; Senator Dilling-HAM, of Vermont; and Senator Percy, of Mississippi; Representative Howell, of New Jersey; Representative Bennet, of New York; and Representative John L. Burnett, of Alabama. They added to that commission a professor from Cornell University, Prof. Jenks; the United States Commissioner of Labor, Mr. Neill, of Illinois; and a leading and representative citizen from California, William R. Wheeler. Seven of the nine members of that commission were located north of the Ohio River, coming from States which have enjoyed foreign immigration. After four years of study, travel, and investigation in Europe and in America every member of that commission, except Mr. Bennet, of New York, recommended to the American Congress that it pass this literacy test. They said further that it was the best and most practical way, under existing conditions in Europe and under their laws, by which we could reduce the immense volume of immigration pouring into this country.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say that the chairman of the committee reporting this bill [Mr. BURNETT] has devoted more time, more energy, more work, more thought to this measure than any man on that commission, or any man in Congress. For that work of such great and far-reaching value to the American people, their welfare and their future, Alabama, the South, and the Nation owe John L. Burnett a debt that can never be fully paid. [Applause.]

I have been a Member of this House and have served with him for five years on one of our standing committees and have had every opportunity to observe his conduct and work, and a more faithful, untiring, conscientious, incorruptible public servant does not live than the gentleman from Alabama [Mr.

BURNETT] who reported this bill. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gordon], in an unkind, uncalled-for, and contemptible manner, referred to the people of the South. Coming, as it does, from the Member from Ohio, of the south. Coming, as it does, from the Member From One, it needs no answer; but I wish to say to him that that great section of the country gave to the Continental Army, which achieved and established freedom and liberty on this continent, George Washington from Virginia. The South gave Thomas Jefferson, who wrote the immortal Declaration of Independence. The South gave Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, Admiral Farragut, Robert E. Lee, and other illustrious men to the Nation, and I submit that it does not lie within the power of the Member from Ohio to question or challenge the courage and patriotism or the intelligence of the South or the southern people. [Applause.]

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, I trusted that all reference in the matter now under discussion to any sectionalism or party, association would disappear. I am one who believes that we should have the best as American citizens. I am one who believes that the privilege of being an American citizen is of the highest consideration and importance. I admire and welcome almost all provisions in this bill, even if it should only be styled to be a codification of existing law. We provide against the derelict who would seek our land, we provide against the mentally weak, we provide against the criminal and the physically unsound. We demand that none shall seek our shores, or seek to embrace American citizenship, unless perfect mentally, unless perfect morally, and unless perfect physically. I feel that the additional qualification is needless and unnecessary and meaningless. The lack of education or opportunity to acquire education is, perchance, one of the accidents of life, and it is not dependent on the lack of moral character, the lack of application, but is rather the lack of opportunity.

We know well in reading the history of the world how education has been denied in years gone by by reason of religious or other prejudices. We have extended our ideals and set ourselves up as a model to the nations of the world. We have enunciated the doctrine of equality of man before the law. have added to it the great work of the Maker in the creation of men equal. Should we now say that the rule of chance shall deny the opportunity to embrace in the citizenship of this country one morally good, one physically strong, one abandoning the hearthstone in his mother country, one who seeks this land for the exercise of his God-given right of freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and freedom of religious and civil liberty, who comes here to give us the best that is in him for the uplift of his own people as well as those whom he joins? It means little, to me, the amount of restriction under the educational clause. I would have the man who seeks our shores compelled in a short period to qualify himself by an educational test for citizenship, or go out never to return I would not permit a man to come here and merely take the cash, go away and deposit it on other shores. I am not unmindful of the history of our land and of the many men who occupy seats on the floor of this House. I am not unmindful of the fact that they came from an ancestry that has nothing to boast of but their honesty, morality, application, and determination; who left their mother's side and father's side to seek this land in the hope of the uplift of their children and to be given an opportunity to work out their salvation both temporal and eternal. [Loud applause.]

If we must restrict, let us do so in an actual and practical way. Let us restrict on a numerical basis the immigrants coming into the country. If it is feared that there will be an influx of those whose number will interfere with American industry, American progress, and American return for energy and application, or who will compete unduly with us, let us restrict the number; but when we do not undertake to bar immigration in toto from this land of ours, let us not be guilty of adopting a means which strikes at that which is perhaps no fault of those seeking refuge here and may be the outcome of religious or political oppression.

We are properly legislating to exclude from our shores the morally unfit, the mentally incapacitated, the physically unclean, the dependent upon American charity, and those whose thoughts and beliefs are counter to government or the maintenance of law and order. Why should we add to this a makeshift, and where the mentally strong and physically perfect, the man of pure heart and good intentions—the object, perchance, of persecution that denied to him an opportunity for education—seeks our land to give the best that is in him to our institutions, strong physical manhood and a pure heart, deny him the opportunity and continue the work directed against him in his native land?

Make positive and immediate enforcement of the law against the alien who has had permission to enter the country and inveighs against our institutions and our principles should be our motto. Very frequently he is the educated man who could meet the requirement of this bill.

I believe the best is not too good for American citizenship, but do not let us by indirection do something that we should not do, and if immigration is to be restricted, if there are too many coming here, let us restrict upon a mathematical calculation and based upon a sound foundation.

Mr. KENT. We in this country have a choice of two things. We can either act as a lighthouse or as a dumping ground. We can either work out the problem of democracy amongst the fit or we can say that we are willing to be flooded by the world and take our chances in the great world struggle. can not digest all population that may come to this country under a policy of unrestricted immigration. We can not accept the dogma of the orthodox socialist, that every man has a right to go anywhere on the face of the earth that he chooses and there settle. We who are here owe our democracy to selected races. We owe our democracy to races that have long struggled for constitutional liberty and who know what it means. Therefore I say that, in my opinion at least, it is necessary that we carefully select our citizenship. It is, more than that, necessary for democracy that all of the people who are in our country, whatever their avocations may be, should be a part of the We do not want a man who does not vote to dig sewers and lay track, to black shoes, or to perform any other service, high or low. Our duty to-day is to see to it that the work that is called dirty work is made sufficiently dignified work for our children to perform.

We know perfectly well that the resources of the world are not inexhaustible. There was a time not long ago when our people believed that the timber resources of this country were inexhaustible, and so we slaughtered and murdered our timber, and we are now coming to the end of that resource.

It is just idle to say that the land of this country is inexhaustible. We know perfectly well that the best land has already been taken up. We know perfectly well that if we become as thickly populated as some of the old countries we will have misery at our doors and lack of food and will be struggling for existence. Until we go ahead and by scientific investigation find out better means of intensive agriculture, find out better means of supplying food to our people, find out better means of distribution among our people, find out where they can work more profitably, where they can work under better circumstances, we had better cut off this immigration in every way in our power. I for my part would like immigration stopped until we can settle our own struggles amongst ourselves and create better conditions for all the people now within That not being feasible, we must look to some means of restriction, and in this literacy test I can see a means which, although not perfect, it is easy to argue against on sentimental grounds, yet at the same time has much to commend it. The people in our country who are most exploited, who are most abused, who furnish the most horrible example of what democracy ought not to be, are the people who from lack of education are most easily subject to oppression, and therefore, pending other and better measures, pending a bill that might be all wise, I stand for this literacy test, knowing that it is not complete, knowing all the arguments that can be made against it, having great sympathy with those who stand against it. the same time, in the interest of all our people, I believe that this is about as good a test as has been suggested, and I believe that it is one that at the present time we would do well to adopt. [Applause.]

[Mr. DECKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall oppose this bill in its present form; not because it restricts immigration but because the report filed with it shows that after five years' investigation of the great subject, ability to read 40 words is the sole important additional test which would admit or bar a seeker of an American home or citizenship. I do not think that requirement should be given the dignity of an epochal advance in legislation.

I am not convinced that ability to read, however desirable an accomplishment, is sufficiently important to determine whether a citizen is a desirable or an undesirable. The time is coming when this great Government, seeking to place its stamp of approval or disapproval upon not only him who would come but him who would be permitted to stay, will apply the test of loyalty and character—the most important evidences of which will not be reading and writing. [Applause.]

will not be reading and writing. [Applause.]

Throughout our country the different communities are not so solicitous as to ability to read. I was in one of the States of the Union, whose Representatives are here pressing this measure, a short time after their primary was held. A couple of partisans were talking about a successful aspirant for a local office. One said, "He ain't fitten for it. He can not read writing." "Cose not," said the other. "Eph can not read reading, but he won at the primary, and that settles us." [Applause.]

Reading is an excellent accomplishment. I wish all had it,

Reading is an excellent accomplishment. I wish all had it, but it is an accomplishment which aids in crime as well as in culture and refinement. A smattering of education abroad does not necessarily prepare an immigrant to enter into the spirit and genius of our institutions, to obey our laws as to life, liberty, property, and family, or imbue him with a devoted and militant love of our flag.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SLOAN. I have not the time.

I want to further say that we need not fear the foreign immigrant who would be excluded by this test on account of crime. Schrank, the miscreant who shot ex-President Roosevelt, would receive a welcome at our ports under this law, because he was born in foreign lands and there learned to read. More than this, the three great consummated tragedies of our Nation were committed by men all of whom, if knocking at our doors, could have met this new insufficient test. The great but gentle McKinley fell at the hands of Czolgosz, a man of some reading as well as education. The mighty Garfield went down from the bullet of Guiteau, a man learned in the law and of oratorical pretensions. And Lincoln came to his martyrdom by the assassin Booth, who was educated, refined, gifted, and dramatic.

In my district there are numerous Germans, Scandinavians, Irish, Scotch, English, Bohemians, and Poles. They are tillers of the soil, thrifty business men, good citizens, supporters of education, and a discriminating electorate. They do not allow themselves to become fixed factors in annual elections, but discriminate year by year as to men, measures, and parties, and in that way show the highest grade of useful citizenship. We think of them as possessors of these qualities rather than of the mere ability to read and write, which of course nearly all of them can do. However, some of the older ones of each nationality came to this country and were then and are even now unable to read and write. But they have succeeded, and with a credit to their several communities and races, notwith-standing that defect. From all these classes, as I gather from the pension rolls, many did not hesitate when our country's call was made, and those who met them on the field of battle found, that while many could not write their names, every one could make his mark. [Applause.]

I especially oppose this bill, because in the report which the committee filed it complains of the large number of immigrants coming from Austria-Hungary. Many thousands of these have come from the mountain-girt Province of Bohemia to my State and district. They came to toil, to learn, to advance and become worthy citizens of the Nation. They brought their genius for farming as well as their thrift. Our rich soils pay no higher tribute to husbandry's efforts than to our Bohemian farmers. They support our schools, their youths attend our universities, their sons serve in our Armies. They establish and maintain good homes and adorn our professions.

After all, gentlemen, the trick of reading neither makes nor unmakes a good American citizen. What we want from the other shores for our growth and development are healthy minds and clean bodies, transmitted without taint from a healthy ancestry and from willing hands, honest purposes, and loyal hearts. For of these are our best citizens made, whether American or foreign born. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, within a short period of about eight months in this House, I have seen a remarkable conversion of some gentlemen, particularly the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore]. I heard his eloquent voice here during the tariff debate, loud and vociferous, appealing to this House to keep up the tariff wall to the prohibitive stage, not because he wanted to benefit the manufacturers of the country, but his soul was possessed of one thing only, and that was the protection of the American laborer. Oh, protect the American laborer by keeping the tariff wall so high that nothing that is made by foreigners can come into this country! I will just suggest to the gentleman that within six months, up to January 1 of this year, nearly 735,000 foreigners have landed on the American shores to compete with the very men he was so solicitous about eight months ago.

Now, they want to let down the immigration walls and allow them all to come in. So I do not believe he was sincere when he said eight months ago that he wanted to protect the American laborer. I believe he did not want to protect anybody but the American manufacturer, and I think the American laboring class will put a proper tag on the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I regret that my genial friend from Minnesota [Mr. Mana-HAN] has been so harsh in his statements about the South. I regret that that subject has been injected into this debate, although we have got to have some yardstick by which to measure a foreigner landing on these shores, either educational or otherwise. Has the gentleman from Minnesota forgotten that 50 years ago Sherman left one broad streak of charcoal from Charlotte, N. C., to Savannah, Ga.? Does he forget that the invading armies of the North destroyed our homes, confiscated our cattle, destroyed every vestige of property that we had, and that after all that was over we were left with 4,000,000 helpless former slaves to care for and to feed? From that day to this those men who were then slaves have multiplied until we have 9,000,000 of them in the Southern States, and to-day in the State of Georgia and the State of Alabama, and in practically every other Southern State, the people who freed them 50 years ago contribute 90 per cent of the taxes to educate them. To-day 300,000 of them in the State of Georgia are going to our public schools almost entirely at the expense of our white population.

The white men who are illiterate in the South to-day are the men who were deprived of the privileges of an education because of the fact that when the war was over they were called to the plow handles and were called to every other vocation in life to make a living, and they were forced to put their little children in the devastated fields to help in the almost insurmountable task of rehabilitation of our desolate land.

Mr. MANAHAN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. MANAHAN. Would not the same character of men now in Bohemia have also prized an education and have made the same good citizens if they had had it?

Mr. HOWARD. In reply to the gentleman I will say that 10 years ago 31.6 per cent of the people of Georgia were illiterate, and in 1910 we reduced that percentage of illiteracy to 22.6 per cent. We want the people of the South and of Georgia to be literate and we want them educated, and we will educate them; but we have had enough burdens to bear from the negro, without having turned in on us with a steady stream your dear Bohemians and southern Italians not only for us to educate but to compete with the free-born American citizen, through whose veins courses the purest Anglo-Saxon blood in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Bailey] is recognized.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, about 35 per cent of the population of my home county is made up of people of alien birth. About 10 per cent of the population in another county in my district is composed of foreign-born people. The third county in that district has less than 5 per cent of foreign-born population.

My own county is one of the most thriving and progressive in the whole State. It has been growing rapidly in population and in industry, the percentage of increase being almost if not quite the largest in Pennsylvania. The great steel plants and the mines alike depend in an increasing measure on the men of foreign birth for their labor supply. Last year the Cambria Steel Co., employing as high as 21,500 men, was hampered in its operations by a lack of help. It needed at one time 2,000 men, which it could not secure. Its total output of wealth was therefore less than it would have been had it been able anywhere to find the labor so greatly needed.

Mr. Chairman, it has been complained of on this floor that the foreigners lower the standard of American living, and that they likewise lower the moral standards of our society. I do not believe this to be true. The foreigners in my town are numbered by the thousands. They have at least half a dozen large churches and a number of flourishing schools. Of course, they are not fully Americanized. They do not at once take on American habits and observe American conventions. They quite naturally cling to the habits and conventions of the old home, just as we would do were we to go into a strange country among a strange people. But on the whole they are law-abiding; they are industrious; they are thrifty; they are ambitious; they are anxious to learn our ways; they love the freedom which they find under our flag; they are proud of the liberties which our free institutions offer them; they lose no time in becoming citizens, so that they may participate in that self-government which so mightily appeals to those to whom self-government was denied in the old home; they send their children into the public school to learn the language and to equip themselves for better things than the parents hope to attain; and they are driving stakes deep into the soil of the adopted land by buying homes and establishing themselves for a more hopeful future.

Among my constituents are many Italians, many Poles, many Hungarians, many Slavs, and many of other nationalities. All alike seem to be industrious, frugal, and anxious to get ahead. The notion that they are willing to accept any sort of wages is false. They know the market value of labor, and they are as insistent as any native on getting the highest wage prevailing.

It is true that some of them live in a hard way, crowding into tenements unwholesomely, faring poorly, possessing few of the comforts of life, in some cases the conditions being such as to breed disease and perhaps engender immorality. But may not as much be said of some of our native population? Do we find only people of foreign birth herded in tenements amid filth and squalor under conditions which forbid all the refinements of life, and which make inevitably for a lowering of the moral standard as affecting the sexes? As a matter of fact, overcrowding amid unwholesome surroundings is not peculiar to any particular race or nativity. Its victims are simply the victims of poverty, and this scourge of our twentieth century civilization does not stop to inquire whether those it blights were born under the Stars and Stripes or under some alien flag.

The immigrants who make up so large a part of the population of my county, and who in smaller numbers contribute to the population of the other two counties in my district, are sharing in full measure in the gainful work which is going on in mill and mine. We have in Johnstown one of the greatest steel plants in America. Thousands of men of foreign birth are employed in its various departments. They, in fact, constitute the bone and sinew of that vast industry, the product of which goes into every State and into almost every conceivable manufacture of which steel is a component part or a raw material. Italian and Slav, Russian and Pole, Magyar and Croat, Lithuanian and Serb, all alike swarm about in these roaring hives of labor, and all alike contribute to the stream of wealth which flows thence to enrich the land and to increase the sum of human comfort. To asperse these people and to charge them with presenting a menace to our institutions is to betray ignorance of the truth and to do an unwarranted injustice to people who have paid us the high tribute of leaving their native land to cast in their lot with us in working out the destinies of the Republic.

But it is said that they send money back to the old country, Yes; they do. Perhaps a hundred millions a year; possibly Yet what of that? Of course they do not send money at all. What they do send is a draft on the labor they have done or on the product of that labor, and that labor or its results surely belongs to them. It can not belong to anyone else, and no one is being robbed of anything which belongs to him when a Slav or an Italian or a Magyar in Johnstown transfers to his old mother across the wide waters or to his sister or to his wife a part of what he has produced by his toil. It is his to do with as he wills so long as he does not employ it to the injury of his neighbor. With equal propriety and jus-tice we might make war on the thousands of Americans who every year rush across the Atlantic to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in sight-seeing and in fast living. But who thinks of challenging the right of Americans thus to spend what is theirs? Who thinks of attributing the country's woes in any part to this drain or supposed drain upon its resources? Certainly not the author of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said on this floor many times during the debate on this measure that what is proposed is in the interest of labor. The old notion that capital employs labor has run through many, if not most, of the speeches to which I have listened. It is assumed that there is just so much money to be paid in wages and that the share of each in the whole is determined by the number of laborers competing for employ-ment. A falser idea never found acceptance in the world. Capital never at any time or in any place employed labor. Labor always employs and always must employ capital. It were as true to say that the wheelbarrow runs the man at the handles as that capital in any other form employs the labor which acts upon or through it. Capital is a mere instrument in the hands of labor. It is inert within itself. It produces nothing. But for labor it would be as dead as the stones that pave the streets or as the mammoth whose bones we view in the museum. Capital does not employ labor. It is just the other way around. Labor employs capital, and labor creates its own capital as it goes along. All that labor needs is opportunity. It asks only for access to the storehouse which God has provided for all mankind. Denied this, it is helpless, indeed. there be a dearth of employment, it is not because there is no capital to furnish it; it is because labor is shut out from forest and mine, from the field and the vineyard, from the rich resources which lie all about untouched, yet forestalled against him who would enter in and work the miracle which labor always achieves when it finds access to the bounties of nature.

It has been a matter of amazement to me, Mr. Chairman, that throughout this discussion it has been taken for granted that labor is being ground down because there are too many If this were so, then the sooner we take seriously to race suicide the better. We might, indeed, adopt the suggestion of Dean Swift and advise the poor to eat their children rather than try to raise and educate them. But it is not true. Every man who is born comes into the world with two hands. And to say that when he comes it is only to cumber the earth and to crowd out some one who got here earlier is to blaspheme the Creator and to ascribe to the Maker of the universe a blunder so monstrous as to be inconceivable. The trouble is not that there are too many people. It is that there are too few opportunities. And this happens not because of any actual dearth of opportunities, but only because these have been seized upon, forestalled, locked up against the need of later comers, fenced in with paper titles from those who could and would use them if permission were not denied.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is the crux of the whole matter. shall not cure the troubles besetting our civilization by such restrictions as are here contemplated; they will persist in spite of such plasters and poultices and ligatures. Opportunities will be no freer to labor to-morrow, after we have shut our ports, than they are to-day. They will still be fenced off, locked up, forestalled. Labor will still have to pay royal tribute for access thereto. It will still have to go hat in hand to the master for bare leave to toll accepting such terms as he may master for bare leave to toll, accepting such terms as he may choose to make. It will still be pressed down by that iron law of wages which decrees that labor shall be allowed to retain only such part of its product as will enable it to live and reproduce.

If the argument holds good as to the foreigner who seeks our shores, it must hold equally good as to the baby born to-day in the American home. If our land be crowded, it will be the more crowded for the coming of this little one which a mother is pressing to her breast and over which a proud father is dreaming dreams. If restriction is the cure for low wages, then let us go the limit of the argument. Let us restrict the birth rate. Let us forbid marriage. Let us kill off by pestilence or war or famine enough of those already here to leave elbow room for the rest. But which of you will offer himself for this glorious sacrifice? Which of you will slay the babe now nestling in the mother's arms? Which of you will dedicate yourselves to celibacy and to race suicide? Not you, nor you, nor you. No. There is not one of you that will accept the logic of the position you have assumed. Your instincts rebel against anything so monstrous. Yet you accept the logic when it applies to your neighbor or to the stranger within the gate. You deny it only when it comes home to grip you in its deadly coils. You rebel against it only when it rises to challenge your right to live your life and to work out your destinies. But the logic itself remains, no matter what you say when it knocks at your own door. If restriction is the cure for our economic ills, or if it be even a palliative, then restriction will work in one direction as well as in another, as surely and as efficaciously in cutting down the birth rate or in decimating the population through pestilence or war as by closing the ports against the labor that would come in from abroad. [Applause.]

sylvania has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. METZ rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York IMr.

Metz] is recognized.

Mr. Metz. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything on this subject, but I feel rather surprised to find that the gentlemen of the South are the very ones who are opposed to the amendment to take away this test.

I am interested in the South, and I think that if any section of this country needs labor it is the South. [Applause.] mean by that the kind of labor that uses brains, the kind of labor that of necessity needs to read or write, but has some common sense, such as we have in the East, and particularly in New York. We are not afraid there of the man who can not read and We are afraid of the man who is possessed not only of the ability to read and write, but who is possessed also of things we do not want here. He is the man we are afraid of. [Laughter.]

I can take you to my district, Mr. Chairman, and show you a night school there where there are a thousand women who can not speak a word of any language except Yiddish. with them their children, 4 and 5 and 6 years old, and have them beside them while they try to learn the language of this Many of them can not read or write in any language. Those children go to the public schools, and they graduate from school at the age of 11 or 12 years. They grow up and take the civil-service examinations, and their names are at the top of every civil-service list in New York, and you can not keep them off. Do you not suppose their fathers and mothers would have done equally well if they had had the same chance? I do not say they make the best citizens, but their parents are as good as many of those born in this country, and in some instances better.

We had one school on the island of Manhattan, in the old city of New York, where the children spoke 29 different languages, and the only foreign tongue spoken in that school was English. [Laughter.] That is a fact. Where would those children have been if their parents could not have come in simply because they could not read or write? Now, what will become of them if we let them get away from us and become socialists and anarchists, and all that? If they do, it is our own fault? Let us bring them in. There is no bar against them, as far as we are concerned in New York, and I am surprised to see that the people of the South are in favor of keeping them out. The people of the South need them, if anybody does

You tried to get them down there, but you could not keep You tried in the cotton mills down there to get Italians, them. but they would not stay with you. Why? Because they wanted a glass of wine or a glass of beer, and you would not let them have it. That is why they would not stay with you. [Laughter.] It was your own fault. You would not give them the things that they want, things to which they were accustomed in their own country. You get all you want in your clubs. I am invited, when I go there, to the clubs in Charlotte and Atlanta, where my business is located, and when I go there I can get drunk 24 hours a day if I want to. [Laughter.] Yet those people can not get what they want down there to save their lives. So, I say, you are to blame when you can not keep them there. I am glad to have the chance to tell you gentlemen that that is the fact. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HARDY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized.

Mr. HARDY, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to make a short statement showing the position I occupy. I will take but a few

The other day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gard-NER] made the bald, bold, fearless, and frank statement that, in his opinion, we had reached a period in our national life where we favored restriction for restriction's sake, and that that was the real purpose of this bill. I heard the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Decker] in an eloquent speech a moment ago say that he was for this bill because its purpose was restriction for restriction's sake. That sounds to me like the old cry of years ago, of "America for Americans." It sounds to me as though it were a resurrection voice from the grave of know-nothing-

m. [Applause.] The ghost walks!
Then I listened to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Mus-RAY] the other day when he advocated his amendment to the religious freedom section of this bill. He said that this country, so long as his sentiments prevailed, would be a country where all men could find religious freedom, where he who fled from persecution for religion's sake abroad might find a refuge and a safe harbor. Are we, in this day and time crying, "America for Americans," "Restriction for restriction's sake," to say that we will furnish a harbor and a haven of refuge for those who seek religious freedom and flee from religious persecution, but that we have no harbor of safety, no haven of rest for the man who flies from industrial slavery? [Applause.]

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Murray] was half right—the man who fears God ought to find a place to worship in freedom here. No less ought the honest and true man to find a place here to work in freedom. These gentlemen in substance say an immigrant may be a good man and true, but we avail ourselves of the excuse of illiteracy and exclude him because we are for restriction for restriction's sake. I think I understand the old doctrine and teaching of the Democratic Party when they fought know-nothingism; and I believe that the time has come when know-nothingism, under a little different guise, is stalking abroad to-day. [Applause.] The time may come when our overcrowded population will make us say, "We have no more help, no more space to give to the deserving poor and the oppressed of other lands," but, thank God, that time has not come yet. When that time comes, when population is thick in our borders and we can furnish no more sustenance, no more opportunity to those who come here, then it will be time enough to turn them back; but to the honest, God-fearing man, though he may not be able to read, the man under whose shirt beats a heart as humane and devoted and patriotic as mine, to that man I am not ready to deny industrial opportunity or to shut the door of hope. It seems to me that is the gist of the whole matter. [Applause.]

It seems to me that is the truth of the whole matter. told that we have only 16 per cent of the lands of Texas yet under cultivation, and I know some Italians down on the Brazos. I inquired what kind of citizens they were making and I was told that the constable came around one Sunday when one of them was working and told him to stop. The Italian said, "If you will not let me work on Sunday, I can work by moonlight," and he did, and that is the only violation of law I have heard that they have been guilty of. [Applause and laughter.] I do not know a great deal about them, but I know they do work, and when they go into a country and go to farming they make it bloom like a garden. [Applause.] I know, furthermore, that more than 30 years ago I traveled through one section of my State and got off the right road and for two hours I could not find the way because nobody I met could speak English, and I could speak only English. They were Germans and Bohemians in that section that I was then traveling through. They are good law-abiding citizens to-day and theirs is a prosperous portion of our State.

For my part I am willing to let every honest, industrious white man who is sound in body and mind and not likely to become a charge on our people, who is not a criminal, against whose record nothing can be brought, whatever may be his geographical habitat, come to our land and go into this "melting pot" of ours and help make in the future, as a product of the whole, the greatest and grandest people the sun ever shone on.

[Applause.]

Gentlemen, our boat is not yet so full that while we are riding safely the waves of the industrial sea we are forced to beat off the clinging hands stretched out to catch our bark, or with our oars beat down beneath the waves the man whose eyer look up to us and plead for help. When our ship is at sea, loaded down to its deck, freighted with all it will bear with our own near and dear and loved ones, then only will our people strike the strugglers in the water. When that time comes strike, but strike with a prayer for mercy for ourselves; strike with despair for our own, for when we strike we shall not reach the other shore. Until then let us still proclaim, as we always have, "This is the land where freedom dwells, where the down-trodden and oppressed may come and freely worship God, and labor and live and prosper." [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas

[Mr. Hardy], who has just preceded me, has referred to the need for these aliens on the farms in Texas and other places. Yet the report of the retiring Commissioner General of Immigration

Notwithstanding the small percentage of rejections, there are those who constantly criticize the Immigration Service on every conceivable ground, even to the extent of asserting that the law is being so enforced as to reduce the labor supply at a time when there is a great demand for labor, especially in connection with agricultural pursuits. Much of this criticism is not honest. Such as is honest is usually based upon ignorance of the law and conditions. Thus those who say the farm-labor supply is being interfered with seem to assume that immigrants from southern and eastern Europe go on the farms, whereas practically none of them do, although they may have been farm laborers in their native countries. As a matter of fact, over 80 per cent of the immigrants of to-day come from southern and western Europe or western Asia, and very few of these have any intention of performing or could be induced to perform farm work in the United States, and in the main dependence must be had upon the 18 or 20 per cent from northern or western Europe for the farmers' labor supply, so far as it can be expected to come from overseas.

So far as my section of the country is concerned we neither

So far as my section of the country is concerned we neither get nor do we desire that class of farm labor that comes from southern Italy or that this bill excludes.

Gentlemen have made prophecies here in regard to the direful effects of this bill upon the Democratic Party. Yet I want to read to you some language that sounds like the words of a philosopher, a patriot, and a statesman:

The census of 1890 showed the population of the country increased to 62.622,250, an addition of 12.466,467 within the decade. Immigrants poured steadily in as before, but with an alteration of stock, which students of affairs marked with uneasiness. Throughout the century men of the sturdy stocks of the north of Europe had made up the main force of the country or else men of the Latin-Gallic stocks of France and northern Italy; but now there came multitudes of men of the lowest class of Italy and men of the meaner sort out of where there was neither skill nor energy nor any initiative of quick intelligence, and they came in numbers which increased from year to year as if the countries of the south of Europe were disburdening themselves of the more sordid and hapless elements of their population, the men whose standards of life and of work were such as American workmen had never dreamed of hitherto. The people of the Pacific coast had clamored these many years against the admission of immigrants out of China, and in May, 1892, got at last what they wanted—a Federal statute which practically excluded from the United States all Chinese who had not already acquired the right of residence; and yet the Chinese were more to be desired as workmen, if not as citizens, than most of the coarse crew that came crowding in every year at the eastern ports. They had, no doubt, many an unsavory habit, bred unwholesome squalor in the crowded quarters where they most abounded in the western seaports, and seemed separated by their very nature from the people among whom they had come to live; but it was their skill, their intelligence, their hardy power of labor, their knack at succeeding and driving duller rivals out, rather than their alien habits that made them feared and hated and led to their exclusion at the prayer of the men they were likely to displace should they multiply. The unlikely fellows who came in at the eastern ports were tolerated because they usurped no place but the ver

That is the language of the President of these United States, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.] And the ones of whom he speaks, Mr. Chairman, are the very people that this bill will keep out. It is not expected to be a manhood test entirely, although, as a matter of fact, many of those that come from that country are not only illiterate, but many of them are criminals. Here is a statement from one of the indees of New inals. Here is a statement from one of the judges of New York, the city from which these gentlemen hail who are making such protests against this bill.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What judge is that?

Mr. BURNETT. Judge Edward Swann, in which he says:

Mr. BURNETT. Judge Edward Swann, in which he says:

The longest period of time that any of the above criminals, Antonio Lencki, Sadie Gross, and Michele Miele, has been in this country is nine months, and how many felonies they have committed before they were caught and convicted no one is able to say. * * * Scarcely a day passes in the court of general sessions that we do not have newly arrived immigrants who have committed felonies here and who show symptoms of confirmed criminal instincts.

Yesterday I had the case of Giovanni Gine, who has been in this country about three months, and when he was arrested for having acted suspiciously at about 2 o'clock in the morning he was found to be a walking arsenal, having on his person two guns, one stilletto, one razor, and a blackjack, and from an investigation of the man it was found that under no circumstances would he make a desirable citizen.

Mr. METZ. Will the continuous violed?

Mr. METZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. No; I can not be interrupted. I saw a ship being loaded in Naples with these kind of fellows, and there was a basket of knives and daggers on the deck. I asked how they came there, and the ship's officers said they took them away from the Italians, because, they said, if they had not taken these weapons from them there would not be a sound man among them when they got to America. These are the people that you, who carry the laborer's card in your pocket and are supporting this amendment of Judge Goldfogle to strike out the illiteracy test, are trying to admit. I trust that the amendment will not

In regard to the criminal tendencies of the illiterates among the aliens, I will here insert a statement from Mr. Frederick A. Pope, prosecutor of pleas of Somerset County, N. J.:

My duties as prosecuting attorney of Somerset County, N. J., have given me an excellent opportunity to check up in one important particular the investigations and conclusions of the Immigration Commission with reference to the illiteracy test. During the last two years I have kept a careful record of the last 114 criminal cases that I have prosecuted against aliens, with the following interesting results:

	Illiterate.	Literate.
Homicide Atrocious assault and battery Simple assault and battery Larceny Sexual crime Perjury Excise Marriage Frands Missellaneous	34 9 14 7 2 11 3 2 6
. Total	91	2

(1) Of the 114 crimes committed by allens 54 were acts of personal violence; and of these 54, 46 were committed by illiterates, while only 8 were chargeable to those able to read and write.

(2) Of the 46 committed by illiterates, 3 were homicides, 34 were atrocious assaults (by maiming and wounding with a deadly weapon), and only 9 were simple assaults, showing conclusively that the illiterate alien 37 times out of 46 makes use of a deadly weapon in order to avenge his wrongs, fancied or real.

(3) Out of 16 cases of larceny (stealing of all kinds), 14 defendants were illiterate.

(4) Out of 8 sexual crimes, 7 were committed by illiterates, 3 of these being carnal abuse of infants under 10 years of age.

(5) Out of 3 perjury cases, 2 were against illiterates; that is, of those brought to justice.

(6) Out of 16 cases for violation of excise laws, 11 were illiterates, showing an utter disregard for laws.

(7) Of the 4 crimes against the institution of marriage, 3 were illiterates.

(8) Only in cases of fraud did the literate exceed the illiterate.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FITZGERALD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title: H. R. 3638. An act providing for the issuance of patent to Joe Joubert.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

By unanimous consent leave to extend remarks in the RECORD was granted to the following: Mr. SABATH, Mr. MANA-HAN, Mr. SLOAN, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. SMITH of New York, Mr. Howard, Mr. Metz, Mr. Burke of Wisconsin, Mr. GOLDFOGLE, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, Mr. DECKER, Mr. BRUMBAUGH, Mr. WEAVER, and Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Pending that, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk an editorial from this morning's World on this subject.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford].

Insert after the semicolon, line 20, page 8, the following:
"All aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who have resided therein continuously for five years, and who have, in accordance with the law, declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States, and who return to the United States within six months from the date of their departure therefrom."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 107 ayes and 111 noes.

Mr. STAFFORD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Stafford and Mr. Bur-

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 132 ayes and 130 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, may we not have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overlooked the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wallin] has offered an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "act," line 14, page 7, add the following:

"Provided, That all aliens seeking admission to the United States under the restrictions herein set forth shall furnish to the immigration authorities of the United States a certificate, duly verified by the chief of police in the city, Province, or country from which they may come, or where they reside, that they have never been convicted of any crime; also a certificate, duly verified, from the health officer or other properly constituted authority, that they or no member of their immediate family have ever been afflicted with insanity in any form."

Mr. GOLDFOGLE: A parliamentary inquiry Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARDNER. I wish to have a point of order pending. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Who offered that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment has no connection with the paragraph upon which debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment is not germane to the paragraph. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle], which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment of Mr. Goldfogle, as follows:

Strike out all words that appear on page 7 from line 15 to 25, inclusive, and all that appear on page 8 from line 1 to 23, inclusive, and also the word "Terri'ory," in line 24, the same composing the so-called literacy or educational test.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOLDFOGLE) there were—ayes 101, noes 160.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported-ayes 120, noes 173.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALLIN]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition, although I admit that there is a good deal to be said in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wallin]. His amendment proposes to do two things. First, it proposes that every alien immigrant shall exhibit a certificate to show that he is not a criminal. Second, it proposes that he shall exhibit a certificate to the effect that he has never had insanity in his blood. I have not given much thought to the second proposal, but we have had some experience to guide us with reference to the first.

Last year in the immigration bill we included a clause which required every alien to show his penal certificate, provided that he came from a country which issued such certificates. There was a vigorous contest over that clause. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnett] and I supported it and the House finally voted with us. Meanwhile the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lengoot] brought to our attention the fact that many well-informed persons were convinced that Russia would arbitrarily withhold such certificates from those whom she desired to retain within her borders. In the Senate Senator LA For-LETTE opposed the penal-certificate clause on substantially the same ground. The result was that the bill was sent back to the conference committee. Somewhat ruefully the conferees voted to expunge the objectionable provision. At heart I admit that I thought the danger imaginary, and I still believe that our immigration officers ought to be required to inspect all the official papers of each alien. For instance, every Italian has in his possession his penal sheet. If he has never been convicted of any offense the sheet is clean. If, on the other hand, he has been found guilty of a transgression, an entry of the facts is made on the culprit's papers. I think it would be a good thing if our inspectors could require the production of those papers. Congress thought otherwise last year. In the interest of the speedy passage of this bill, but for no other reason, I oppose that part of the gentleman's amendment which deals with criminal certificates.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the amend-

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALLIN) there were-ayes 42, noes 141.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 22, after the word "prescribed," strike out all down to and including the word "into," in line 26, page 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Hindoos and all persons of the Mongolian or yellow race, the Malay or brown race, and the African or black race.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, the provision that will be stricken from the bill by this amendment, if it prevails, is as Persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may be eafter be entered into.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to object to that provision, except that I think it is too weak. The purpose is, in the main, the same as is sought to be accomplished by the amendment which I have offered to the bill, but it does not cover the ground thoroughly. I wish it to be understood that I cm not a hater of any race. I believe that I have no race prejudice whatever, but I do believe in racial purity [applause], and I know that no republic can long continue unless it is made up of a homogeneous people, and the people of no country can be homogeneous that has within its borders a very large percentage of a race which is entirely different from the dominant race. The history of the world shows that two races can not live together in the same environment except they amalgamate or one race becomes subject to the other; and I believe that ever, American who has thought on the subject will agree that both these things are evils which we ought by legislation in every way possible to prevent.

I believe that all scientific authorities, with Herbert Spencer at their head, are agreed that the crossing or intermingling of two races wholly unlike, as the Asiatic and Caucasian or the Asiatic and the Malay or the Asiatic and the African, produces a race which can be described by no other word as well as the word "mongrel." In all the history of the world where there has been an amalgamation of these totally different races it has been demonstrated that the worst characteristics of both races generally appear in the progeny. It is on record that among the races of the northern part of South America and of Central America, which are composed sometimes of the African, the Asiatic, and the Caucasian, all three mixed up together, although they are a small percentage of the population, they sometimes supply almost the entire criminal population of those countries. We do not need to go beyond our own country to see the desirability of maintaining our Caucasian race in its purity. We upon the Pacific coast have this problem before us all the time. Many of our brethren in the South have this same race problem before them, and, as I said before, I am offering this amendment not because I have any racial prejudice, but because I recognize that the Caucasian, the African, the Mongolian, and the Malay races are so totally dissimilar that it is desirable from every racial standpoint that they should be kept separate. [Applause.]

Mr. CANTOR. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this matter is not now under investigation by the State Depart-

I am not aware that it is, but the State De-Mr. HAYES. partment is not the legislative department of this Government.

The Congress of the United States is charged with the responsibility of legislation, and I think that now is the time, when we are considering the immigration laws and amending and perfeeting them, to put into this law something that will give the world notice that it is our intention to maintain this country as a residence for the members of the Caucasian race [applause] and for them only.

Mr MOORE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOORE. Has this matter been considered by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization?

Mr. HAYES. It has not.

Mr. MOORE. There is no recommendation from that committee-

Mr. RAKER. Will my colleague yield for a question? Mr. HAYES. I will yield for a question.

The gentleman did not answer my question. I did answer the question; I said "no." Mr. MOORE. Mr. HAYES.

Mr. MOORE. It has not been before the committee?

Mr. HAYES. It has been before the committee, but we have not reported anything.

Mr. RAKER. I will ask my colleage if it is not a fact that House bill 102, which has for its purpose the exclusion of all Asiatic laborers, by unanimous vote of the Committee on Immigration, of which my colleague is a member, has been set for hearings two weeks, and that committee has used two special days for that purpose, and next Thursday is the day set for that hearing, and that there is a favorable report upon my bill from the Department of Labor?

Mr. HAYES. I will say that the Committee on Immigration has not yet considered House bill 102 at all.

Mr. RAKER. Are not considering it? Mr. HAYES. No. And I will further say to the gentleman that this amendment I propose is very much broader than his bill, covering the same principle, but more thoroughly. As I said before, I have offered this in the interest of racial purity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again reported, and then I would like to be heard on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty accord with the purpose of the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], and yet there is a bill pending before our committee now that I think covers every phase of the Asiatic question except the exclusion of the African, and I certainly am in favor of that. That bill can be easily amended if it is desired to do so when it comes up for consideration; but, Mr. Chairman, this question involves some grave questions of treaty rights and obligations.

Last year there were efforts made to put something of the kind in this bill. I am in sympathy with the gentlemen from the Pacific coast entirely on this question; but, gentlemen, if we want to pass this bill the friends of it ought not to put the Hayes amendment in it. I am surprised that the gentleman, Mr. HAYES, who, without having intimated to me he intended to do it, should undertake to load this bill down now and perhaps bring about its defeat in the Senate or possibly its veto by the President, and, not because they antagonize the principle involved in the bill H. R. 102 offered by the distinguished gentleman from California, Mr. RAKER, I hope gentlemen will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from California, Mr. HAYES.

The committee has had two meetings to consider the Raker bill H. R. 102. That bill is being considered and will be acted upon. Something will be done, in my judgment, to remedy to a great extent the conditions on the Pacific slope.

Mr. HAYES. Will my colleague yield? I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that we have had no consideration of that bill?

Mr. BURNETT. Now, we are considering it every Thursday, Mr. Chairman, at our meetings. We have had no hearings. We have been reading parts of the bill and discussing certain features of it.

Mr. HAYES. I want to ask my colleague another question. Mr. BURNETT. If I may have a minute or two of time in addition-

Mr. HAYES. What I wish to ask my colleague is this: If the President will veto this bill if this provision is in it which I propose, will he not veto the bill of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKEB]?

Mr. BURNETT. I think the bill proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] can be so amended as to meet questions of favored nations and as to meet questions involving treaty rights.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BURNETT. I will.
Mr. KEATING. Do you favor the exclusion of Asiatics?
Mr. BURNETT. I do, absolutely.
Mr. KEATING. So do I. Let us exclude them now. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Whenever it comes up, Mr. Chairman, and is acted upon in the proper bill. Gentlemen ought not to be playing for political advantage, Mr. Chairman, when the questions in this bill are involved, and I hope they will not do it.

The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has stated patriotically and magnanimously that his bill was being considered, and that out of deference to the wishes of those of us who did not want to embarrass this bill by putting something of that kind on it, he would withhold his amendment at this time. And now will gentlemen vote to give political advantage to those who, it seems to me, are seeking political advantage against my colleague, who has more ardently, earnestly, and industriously than any man in this House pressed for legislation to exclude Asiatics?

Mr. RAKER and Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. J. R.

KNOWLAND] is recognized.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment of my colleague from California [Mr. Hayes], because I believe that this will be the only opportunity during this session of Congress for the House to vote upon an Asiatic exclusion [Applause.] measure.

I hold in my hand a letter from the head of one department of this Government declaring that an amendment of this character is not in contravention of any treaty obligation. This letter is signed by the Secretary of Labor, and says:

The inherent and constitutional right of the Congress to pass laws of the kind contemplated by these bills, even when the provisions affect nations or subjects of countries with which the United States has treaties containing the "most favored nation" clause, has, of course, been settled beyond peradventure of doubt.

Supreme Court decisions are then quoted to uphold the declaration of the Secretary

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. The date of that letter is January 20, 1914.

I understand that another department of this great Government sent a letter to the committee on the same day taking an opposite position and holding up the bill. It would appear as if an attempt was being made to play both ends against the middle. [Applause.] There presides over one of these departments at infrequent occasions a gentleman who frequently ran upon a national ticket and upon platforms which have declared for an amendment of this character. I shall refer first to the platform of 1900, when William Jennings Bryan was a candidate for President. He was a candidate several times, as some here may recall, but upon all occasions when he was the standard bearer of the Democratic Party the platform contained an Asiatic exclusion plank. This plank of 1900 reads:

We favor the continuance and strict enforcement of the Chinese exclusion law and its application to the same classes of all Asiatic

In 1908 the Democratic platform declared:

But we are opposed to the admission of Asiatic immigrants who can not be amalgamated with our population or whose presence among us would raise a race issue and involve us in diplomatic controversies with oriental powers.

Now is the time to adopt an amendment of this character. And I again predict that if the Members do not vote upon this occasion for an exclusion amendment that during this session of Congress they will not again have an opportunity. No bill will get out of the committee and upon the floor. Now is your oportunity, [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. opportunity.

RAKER] is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, want the provisions of House bill 102 enacted into law. All Asiatic laborers should be excluded, and I shall vote to exclude them at any and all times, but I propose now to state the facts in regard to this matter, so that there can be no possible misunderstanding.

Oh, there will be no laughing when it is over with. I want to state that I am surprised at my colleague from California in presenting the matter as he has done. In the Sixty-second Congress the bill H. R. 13500 was introduced—

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. No; I will not yield. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAKER. In the Sixty-second Congress the bill H. R. 13500 was presented to the Committee on Immigration. I appeared before that committee, and at every meeting they had, until they went into executive session, when they said they did not want me there any longer. [Laughter.] My colleague then appealed to the chairman of that committee, saying that he had a bill before that committee the same as mine, and upon investigation it was found that there was not a bill before that Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANAHAN. I make the point that it is out of order for the gentleman to discuss personal differences between himself and his colleague, and, in addition, it has nothing to do with the merits of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. I shall get to the merits of the bill presently. The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman is talking of what took place in the last Congress, he is in order.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman has no right to state what took place in executive sessions of committees of this House. Mr. RAKER. I will state that I tried to get into the executive session, and they would not let me. [Laughter.]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must not state what oc-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman curred in committee in this Congress.

Mr. RAKER. I have not gotten to this Congress yet, Mr. Chairman. All the California Representatives in Congress for many years have given a written pledge to their people that they would work and vote for the exclusion of Asiatic labor. Those declarations I have in my office. I did not bring them with me, because I did not think this question would come up to-day.

My colleague secured himself to be appointed chairman of a subcommittee to consider my bill, No. 13500, in a Democratic committee. Mr. HAYES, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. REILLY of Connecticut represented that subcommittee; and I want to say to this House that it took me two months to get a hearing on that bill. They gave me then a short time to be heard, and then refused to act on or report the bill to the full committee. The proceedings were not published, and when I appealed to my colleague repeatedly and repeatedly to report that bill out to the full committee he told me there would be no report on the matter to the full committee, as he had it in charge, and added that he did not intend to report it to the full committee.

Now, when this matter came before the Sixty-third Congress after the introduction of House bill No. 102, the outgoing commissioner, Mr. Keefe, and the Secretary of Labor reported favorably upon that bill for the exclusion of the Asiatic labor; and, not to be satisfied with that, the chairman sent down under the new régime and the present commissioner, Mr. Caminetti, and Secretary Wilson made a report on the bill, which is a House document filed on this bill, House Document No. 652

I am advised not to say what occurred before the committee, but I think I can say that the committee unanimously agreed, after my urging, that this legislation should be had in connection with the Burnett bill. They were ractically all in favor of Asiatic exclusion, and the committee determined that they would take up and consider House bill No. 102 upon the question of the exclusion of Asiatic laborers and upon the question of registration.

I believe that these men in the committee were fair. I know they were fair. I know they meant what they said in regard to the question of the exclusion of Asiatics. They know the necessity of it. They know that the Democratic platform declared in 1908 in favor of it. They know that our President in his campaign, or those in charge of the campaign, sent out millions of slips showing that the President was in favor of the exclusion of Asiatics, and that in their judgment that class of people should not become a part of this country, inasmuch as they could not assimilate. The majority of this committee and the Republican members of the committee acquiesced in the opinion that that bill should come up as a separate bill on the ground that it was better to bring it up in that way. They were in favor of it, and inasmuch as this Burnett bill was of such importance—a bill relating to European immigration and the other relating to Asiatic immigration—they contended that the two should not be combined.

One related to immigration and the other related to the exclusion of those who come from Asia; and it was the determination of the committee to keep the two separate, and so that the House could have an early vote upon the Burnett bill, and so that the House might have an early and full vote upon the Asiatic exclusion bill, no amendment was offered to include this on the Burnett bill. And I want to say at this time that my colleagues from California, who have been in Congress for 12 years, never asked the committee for a hearing on their bill.

They have never asked the House to consider it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. When they were in control, with an over-whelming majority in this House and in the Senate, and had control of the Presidency, they made no appeal to the committee to report the bill for the exclusion of Asiatics. And even when the Democratic Party was in power last year they never asked for a hearing, and this legislation was throttled. I want to say that it is poor politics for them now, after we have practically gone over this subject, to seek here to inject this question into the consideration of this bill at this time. Notwithstanding what the committee might have done or what the previous committee might have done, they know that we will vote for an amendment of this kind irrespective of where it comes from or how it comes; but I am as confident as I am standing here that this amendment is not offered with the hope that it will be passed. It is offered to place the Democratic Party in a false light. It is offered to have the Democratic Party go back upon its platform of 1908. It is offered here for the purpose of embarrassing the President. There is no question that the Democrats carried that State because of the declarations of President Wilson upon that subject, because on one side of these slips that were sent out was the statement of where Mr. Wilson stood, in favor of exclusion, and upon the other side of the slip was the statement of where the candidate on the Bull Moose ticket stood, for the admission of Japanese to become citizens of the United States. Those statements were put upon lantern slides and exhibited at all our public meetings in the State of California.

The same question came up in Colorado, Arizona, Oregon, Washington, and the other States. Those States went Democratic, and now these gentlemen want simply to bring this

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RAKER. I yield. Mr. MADDEN. What authority has the gentleman from California for stating that Mr. Roosevelt was in favor of the admission of the Japanese?

Mr. RAKER. When Theodore Roosevelt was President of the United States he sent a message to Congress saying that he was in favor of naturalizing the Japanese.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman got that record? Mr. RAKER. I have it among my documents and I can get it. I do not have it before me at this moment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman get it?
Mr. RAKER. It is a fact, all right; and I will get it and read it into the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. In this connection I ask to have the bill

H. R. 13500 printed in the Record, also H. R. 102 and two reports from the Department of Labor, House Documents Nos.

56 and 652, Sixty-third Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record, as indicated. Is there objec-

Mr. COOPER. I object.
Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Immigration, thoroughly indorsing the bill reported by that committee for the regulation of immigration, I think that my position with reference to the proposition of keeping out any class of undesirable immigrants is very thoroughly and clearly indicated; but I do not believe it is wise or patriotic to inject this particular question into the consideration of the bill which we have before us at this time. Every gentleman in this House knows that it is dealing with an international situation which is now being considered by those authorities of the Government who are charged in the Constitution with the duty of negotiating treaties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SLAYDEN. I have only about three minutes left, and I have not time, or I should be glad to do so.

Mr. Chairman, in handling international affairs of this nature, particularly when it comes to the consideration of an amendment which would be in direct and flagrant contradiction of a solemn treaty regularly entered into, I conceive it to be the duty of every Member of the House, regardless of politics, to stand by the administration, whatever its political complexion may be, while it is engaged in negotiations for the purpose of settling in a regular, orderly, and decent way these problems growing out of the immigration of alien races. And I especially consider it the duty of the Democratic Members of this House, whose administration is now negotiating a treaty for the settlement of these delicate questions, to wait until the Secretary of State and the President of the United States have reported their inability to come to an agreement. Then there will be plenty of time for us to take the truculent attitude which some gentlemen want us to assume. Then, Mr. Chairman, when other methods of a proper, legal, and customary nature have been made, we can if it should appear necessary, assert ourselves, if it please the majority of the House, in a way which will not be misunderstood on the other side of any ocean. Until that time comes it is the duty of every Member of the House, regardless, of politics, as I said before, to stand by the administration which is dealing with a question not political, in a partisan sense.

The gentleman from California [Mr. Hayes] knows that he strikes a responsive chord in my bosom and in that of every. man on the floor of the House when he advocates the purity of the race. God Almighty Himself hates the hybrid. He indicates that by denying the power of reproduction to hybrids. The effort of nature is to keep pure the race. I agree with him that it is essential, if we are to maintain a free Republic, that we should have a homogeneous people, and for that reason, among others, Mr. Chairman, I am giving my cordial support to the bill which has been brought in here by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, [Applause.]

I am for the restriction of immigration or I would not be supporting this bill. I do not want our people forced into an always increasing competition from Europe, Asia, or Africa. But, as a matter of fact, the Asiatic immigration is not an acute or serious matter. It has gone off until it is almost negligible. Although the treaty would permit it, the Emperor of Japan agreed with the President to use his influence to keep his people from coming, and he has kept his word. Now, let us be patient and leave the negotiation of this delicate bit of international business to Secretary Bryan and the ambassador from Japan. I hope the bill we have in hand will not be put in peril by an amendment like this of the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Immigration I submitted a separate report in order that I might express a wish in that report that this Asiatic problem should be considered at this time. The remarks that were made on the floor a few moments ago by my colleague, Mr. RAKER, indicates that this problem has been the football of politics for many years past. Men of every party, have run up and down the Pacific coast with illuminated banners saying what this President did or did not say on the Asiatic question. I remember well in the last campaign the display of President Wilson's words as written down in one of his great books—something to the effect that the Chinese were better than the Italians and the Poles. I remember it well as displayed on the transparencies on our coast.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With pleasure.
Mr. RAKER. Did not the gentleman agree that the question of Asiatic immigration should be handled in a separate bill, and not on the Burnett bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I confess my inexperience, Mr. Chairman, in some matters of this kind. I reserved the right to express my views on the matter. I desire to say that my colleague on the Committee on Immigration, Mr. HAYES, Las had a bill before that committee for years past, and also that my colleague from my State, Mr. HUMPHREY, has a bill now before the committee directly dealing with the matter of Asiatic exclusion. I think that if this problem, which has been buffeted about so long, is not settled soon it will be many, many, years before we of the Pacific coast get out from under gentlemen's agreements and private conventions. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have had within the month a meeting in Tacoma where the good citizens made a private agreement with a steamship company of the coast that the latter would not for the present bring into the country any more Hindus. sad thing that citizens of a State are forced to such steps. And it is only by the practice of eternal vigilance on the part of all the people of the Pacific Coast States, regardless of politics, that the oriental influx has been kept down at all. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment so as to read:
"Strike out all down to and including the word 'naturalization," in line 24, and insert 'Hindus and all persons of the Mongolian or yellow race, the Maiay or brown race, and the African or black race."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am not especially interested in the charges and countercharges as to politics being at the bottom of this proposition. I believe that the gentleman from California [Mr. Raker] is just about as desirous of making political capital out of it as is the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]. I am impressed, Mr. Chairman, that this House ought not to adopt this amendment in its present form, at least, and the object of my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from California is to perfect it, so that if it shall be adopted it will not cause any serious trouble. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, it strikes from the bill this language:

Unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered

If my amendment is adopted, this language will remain in the bill, and it is very clear to me that it ought to remain in the bill. The gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] a few minutes ago undertook to show that if this amendment of the gentleman from California was adopted it would not conflict with any existing treaty. If that is so, the friends of the amendment ought to be willing to say so in the bill itself, and they ought not to object to this proviso remaining in it.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SISSON. If that language remains in the bill, could not the Senate or the President make a treaty, even if the exclusion should be in the bill?
Mr. LENROOT. They could.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman think that we, by law, ought to take away from them the right to do that?

Mr. LENROOT. I was just coming to that—that if this matter is to be dealt with in this general immigration bill at this time, and under these circumstances, we ought not to deal with the broad question of invalidating existing treaties or forbidding the making of new ones that might affect this question. This question is important enough, and the importance of it I am sure is readily seen by every Member of the House, to be considered by itself in a separate bill, and if it is to be considered in this bill the least that we can do is to see to it that it shall not affect either existing treaties or prevent the

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my surprise at the attitude of my colleague from California [Mr. RAKER]. I have no personal controversy with him, and he can not draw me into one. I want also to disavow any purpose of making politics out of this great question. I have since I have been a Member of this House, in season and out of season, at every session, practically since I have been here, for the last nine years, advocated the exclusion of all the Asiatic races; and I have had a bill for that purpose before this House ever since I have been here. To be sure, it has not been referred to the Committee on Immigration, although I have tried to have it referred to that committee. The authorities of the House have referred to that committee. The authorities of the House have insisted that it belonged before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in former Congresses I have been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs and urged them to report it to this House.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HAYES. I can not yield. As I say, this is not a question of politics with me at all. I am surprised at the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Immigration that he was surprised at my offering this amendment. He has evidently forgotten a conversation I had with him last week, because I know that the chairman would not intentionally put me in a false position. I have told many men on this floor that I should offer this amendment, men who I thought would be interested in the matter. I have also shown them the amendment and I have done nothing surreptitiously or as a matter of surprise, nor have I sought to put anyone on the floor in a false position or to put them in a place where they will have to vote for something that they do not want to vote on. I am in favor of the exclusion of the laborers of all races except the Caucasian race, and while I am a Member of this House I shall use every right and power that I have as such Member to embody exclusion of these in the legislation of this country. am sure my colleague from California [Mr. RAKER] will bear me out when I say that since this bill has been before the committee during this Congress I have upon every occasion, when the matter has come up, incidentally or directly before that committee seconded his efforts with all the strength and force at my command to secure consideration and favorable report of his bill and the incorporation of its provisions in the bill now before the House, and notwithstanding his personal attitude toward me I shall continue to do so until I am satisfied that there is no opportunity to accomplish anything of the kind.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman mean to say that his efforts were uniformly unsuccessful with his own party?

Mr. HAYES. They have been with all parties. I have done the best I could to secure such action, but not in a partisan way. Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HAYES. I will for a question.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that my colleague in the committee deprecated the placing of the provision of the bill H. R.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is not in order.

Mr. HAYES. If it is in order, I will be very glad to answer the gentleman's question, and I will say that I have never made any such statement. I tried with the gentleman to secure its incorporation in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is out of order. The Chair sustains the point or order.

The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be allowed to continue for half a minute in order that I may ask a question

Would the gentleman's amendment exclude Japanese and Chinese students?

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I would say that my amendment would not exclude

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. HAYES. I thought I was given half a minute more?
The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman was not.
Mr. HAYES. But the gentleman from Ohio asked that I might continue for half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Ohio for any such purpose.

Mr. HAYES. Then I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.
Mr. HAYES. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that my amendment will not exclude students of the Chinese, Japanese, or of any colored race; nor will it exclude business men, travelers, or any of the excepted class mentioned in the bill. The language excepting them is left in the bill by the amendment; it only excludes laborers. That is all the amendment is intended to exclude. And, if I may say, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will weaken the amendment which I have offered, but if it is necessary to secure the enactment of this legislation I would have no objection-I will not say that I would have no objection, but I would be willing to yield that point and consent that the language "unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into," may remain in the bill, although I prefer it without it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I was challenged to present a record, and I would like to call the attention of the House now to this—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. RAKER. Very well.
Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I hope in the interest of this pending immigration bill that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California will be voted down. All of us in the Committee on Immigration know that the gentleman from California, Mr. RAKER, and the gentleman from California, Mr. HAYES, are most anxious to do the very best they can to secure legislation to stop Mongolian immigration into this country. Almost every man on that committee—perhaps every man on that committee—is in favor of putting an end to Mon-golian immigration into this country. In my opinion the ma-jority of the committee is in favor of reporting at this session a bill to accomplish that very purpose. I personally have not as yet committed myself with regard to reporting such a bill, because I am in doubt whether, as a matter of fact, there is any appreciable Mongolian immigration. I am against the immigration of Mongolians, but if there is in reality practically no such immigration I doubt the wisdom of stirring up an international hornet's nest merely for the purpose of emphasizing my views. The figures given by the Immigration Bureau indicate a negligible immigration of Asiatics. Our committee has been told that the figures are incorrect, because Asiatics are smuggled in against our present laws. If that is the fact, it is a greater appropriation for enforcement, not more laws, which we need.

At all events, let us not lose this bill in some Senate pigeonhole by overloading it with an international complication. Let us look at the matter as the committee looked at it. The committee said, "We want to get this immigration bill through. What has been the trouble with getting immigration bills through in the past? Delay, procrastination, suffocation in committee, obstruction in the House and the Senate. What is going to happen if we adopt this amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]?" When this bill goes to the Senate the State Department will enter a protest and a request for adequate time to take up the question with foreign Governments. Quite properly so, by the way. It is an open secret that the State Department has already in some sort of a way protested against the precipitation of this question. State Department protests, coupled with the efforts of the forces opposing the restriction of immigration, will surely result in a holdup of the bill in the Senate. If past experience is a guide, a Senate holdup will result in the postponement of this whole question to the next Congress. Everyone here realizes that it is exactly that result which is aimed at by the leaders of the opposition to the educational test. Every man on the Committee on Immigration, with the possible exception of Mr. Johnson of Washington, feared that such might be the result. The committee was good enough to follow the advice of those Members who were sincerely anxious to get this immigration bill through, those Members whose experience for years has shown the difficulty of getting this question before the House and the Senate. The committee was persuaded to consider in a separate measure the proposals of the gentleman from California, Mr. Raker, and the proposals of the gentleman from California, Mr. HAYES.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman—
Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is exhausted on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I make the point of order this is an amendment to an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make an am Mr. Chairman, I make an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have taken the floor on this bill, and I would like to ask unanimous consent to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN .. Does the gentleman from Virginia insist on his point of order?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent. I shall not object to that.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, it is very unfortunate at this time that partisanship has been injected into this discussion. It is unfortunate that it has been injected in here by one of the Representatives of California, a man who is the author of a bill looking toward Asiatic exclusion. It is unfortunate that it is offered at this time and the charge made against another Representative from California, who has had a bill in Congress for a number of years for Asiatic exclusion.

A great deal of stress has been laid by the chairman of the committee and the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] as to how the committee has proceeded. Now, let us see what the facts are. The Committee on Immigration, at the solicitation of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and many other people interested in Asiatic exclusion, set, believe, the 22d of January for a public hearing on the bill H. R. 102 and on the bill introduced by my colleague from California [Mr. HAYES].

I want to call the attention of the committee particularly to this fact: In California in 1907, 1909, and 1911, at the time when anti-Asiatic measures were pending before our legislature, the Japanese Government, through its representatives in this country, followed out a very wise course in the matter of publicity. About the time that some measure would appear before the California Legislature and become a live issue the papers would be full of the fact that somebody in Japan, the minister of foreign affairs through the Japanese ambassador. was corresponding with the United States Government and calling attention to the fact that their treaty rights were liable to be violated. They succeeded in 1907, 1909, and 1911, through pressure from Washington, in stopping the California Legislature from enacting antialien land laws or other legislation affecting Asiatics by a carefully planned campaign. What has been our experience here? On the morning of January 22 there appeared in all of the Washington papers and in every other paper throughout this country, given to the press by the Japanese ambassador, a speech made in the Japanese Parliament by the minister of foreign affairs.

This speech was in relation to the controversy brought about by the protest of Japan against the passage of the alien-land law by the California Legislature, and was a plain statement that the Japanese Government was not satisfied with the way that the State Department and the administration at Washington had proceeded in this matter, and served notice that the Japanese Government was not through, and that in the future in matters of this kind they would try some other way. Reading between the lines, and taking past performances by the Japanese nation, especially in the controversies with China and Russia, into consideration, we are free to draw our own conclusions as to what was meant by "another way." It is a remarkable coincidence that the Japanese Government could allow months to elapse before making public in a spectacular way their position in regard to the California legislation. This legislation was enacted in the early part of 1913, and it remained for the representatives of the Japanese Government to wait until the morning of the day upon which a hearing was to be held on two bills providing for the exclusion of all Asiatics to publish, through the speech of the minister of foreign affairs, their answer to the State Department. Giving this matter the serious consideration which it deserves, one conclusion only can be arrived at, and that is that this move, coming at the time when the Committee on Immigration of the House of Representatives was about to take up these two measurer, was made for a certain definite purpose, and that it was published with the object in view of having those in charge of diplomatic affairs call a halt as far as any particular activity by the committee in furtherance of this legislation.

What was the reason for that? Their object was to influence this case, and it did influence it to this effect, that when those of us who wanted to be heard on the bill H. R. 102 and on the bill introduced by Representative Hayes, which is before the Committee on Immigration, we found that committee behind closed doors, and they have been conducting their consideration of Asiatic-exclusion legislation behind closed doors since that time and have not conducted any public hearings to date.

Now, I believe with my colleague from California, Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND, that if we do not get a chance to vote on this proposition as an amendment to the Burnett immigration act we will not get a chance at this session of Congress to vote on Asiatic exclusion. I venture that prophecy, Mr. Chairman, and I am sincere in it. I voted with this administration on practically every one of their big measures, and I expect to vote with this administration on every measure which is progressive and in the interests of the people of this country, but I do not want to see this opportunity, that California and the Pacific coast have been waiting for for a great many years, lost. I do not question the sincerity of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], but I doubt his judgment in letting this matter go the way it has. And unless we get action this time the people of the West, the people who want protection from the Asiatics, will have had their last chance for a number of years.

It seems strange that any movement, either by one of our sovereign States or by the House of Representatives or by the United States Senate, which has for its object the protection of our people from Asiatic invasion immediately stirs up a storm of protest on behalf of the Japanese Government, they contending that their national honor is being assailed. It is also strange that a number of the British possessions from time to time have had serious disturbances involving Japanese subjects, especially in the Province of British Columbia, without any talk of war being declared by Japan against England; and also the fact that another one of the British Coloniestralia-has a rigid Japanese-exclusion act in force without bringing about any serious international complications. whenever our people even intimate that remedial legislation is desired the newspapers carry big scare heads announcing impending war. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that the national honor of our own people should be our first consideration, and whenever we find a menace to our public institutions, whether it be black, brown, or yellow, we should take a firm position and enact legislation that will protect our people, whether it be laborer, mechanic, farmer, or business man, and make us what we ought to be—a homogeneous people. The Japanese Government itself in entering into what is generally known as a "gentleman's agreement," whereby they agreed whereby they agreed nown as a genteman's agreement, whereby they agreed not to issue passports to laborers for the purpose of emigrating to the United States, concede the principle involved in the Raker and the Hayes bills, which is exclusion.

If their national honor is to be offended through an act of this kind, then they themselves are responsible, as they conceded our right to exclude the laborers coming from Japan when they entered into this private compact with the officers of our Department of State in 1907; and they should not complain if the people of this country, speaking through their National Legislature, see fit to enact into law what they agreed to was right by private agreement. It is strange that we can have our diplomatic differences with the nations of the earth, such as we have with England over free canal tolls for our coastwise shipping, with Colombia over the Canal Zone, with other nations on a variety of subjects, but when it comes to diplomatic differences with Japan this country is immediately threatened with being plunged into war. So, I say again, that sooner or later we must awaken to the fact that we also have our national honor at stake, which we must always be on guard to preserve, and not at the mere mention of some slight difficulty with the Japanese Nation be immediately plunged into a panic.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by my colleague from California [Mr. Haves] to the pending immigration bill, as I believe this is the time to enact Asiatic exclusion laws, and I trust this amendment will be adopted by the committee and enacted into law by this session of Congres

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, which I shall not do at the end, what is the understanding, if I may ascertain, in reference to how long we will run.

Mr. BURNETT. I have canvassed the matter with the leader of the minority and the gentleman having charge of the minority side of this bill, and we have agreed, if the committee will concur with us, that when the committee rises it will rise at 6.30 p. m., and that then we will have an agreement in the House that we meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m., and we would like to understand now, so no gentleman will raise any question in the House, if there is objection to that.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman I undertook to canvass this side of the House, and there were not many Members here then, and there was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, having seen several Members on this side who are interested, I am inclined to believe that no one will raise any objection to the agreement that we should rise at 6.30 p. m., and commence to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman-The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE. I wanted to offer ar amendment and have it pending; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. There are already two amendments pending. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman raised a question as to my statement as to what was said in the President's message. I call the attention of the House to the message that was presented on December 4, 1906, to the Senate, to be found on page 31 of the Congressional Record, volume 41, part 1, which reads as follows:

I recommend to the Congress that an act be passed specifically providing for the naturalization of Japanese who come here intending to become American citizens.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAKER. This is Theodore Roosevelt's message to the Senate and to the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAKER. I will yield for a question.
Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell the House how, in the face of that statement of fact, with the knowledge on the part of the citizens of California that Mr. Roosevelt, as President of the United States, had recommended the enfranchise-ment of the Japanese and Chinese, the people of California yet voted for him for President, and he got the electoral vote of that State?

Mr. RAKER. Of course they did not. They voted for a governor who was a native son and the candidate for Vice President, and even he did not carry the State. There were three Democratic electors who were elected, and the rest were counted out. They were entitled to the entire California vote. [Laughter, and cries of "Oh, no!"] There is no question about that, gentlemen; and the record shows it. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to raise any feeling between my colleague and myself, but the facts ought to be presented to the House. There was no bill introduced by my colleague upon this question at the time this matter was brought before the Committee on Immigration. There was no bill referred to the Department of Labor for a report; and I say to the House to-day that had it not been for the distinct understanding of all the members of the committee, practically unanimous, that they all believed it was better for the Burnett bill not to have the question of Asiatic exclusion on it, but to bring in the question of Asiatic exclusion separate and distinct, that would have been placed, I believe, upon the Burnett bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When the gentleman says "all members of the committee," does he include the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. RAKER. Practically all. I stood with the gentleman from Washington, who claimed to be in favor of exclusion of Asiatic laborers at all times and under all circumstances, and if he says now that he is not in favor of that exclusion, it is an utter surprise to me, considering my understanding at that

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course, I am for Asiatic exclusion. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a ques-

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield for another question. Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to make it clear in the RECORD. I do not want it misunderstood. I do not want to bring committee matters here, but I desire to have it appear in the RECORD that I distinctly made an individual report, which made it clear that I was in favor of handling Asiatic exclusion

Mr. RAKER. But the gentleman knows, and every member of that committee knows, that by virtue of a prior understanding, that House bill 102 would be considered, the committee never voted whether we would put the bill H. R. 102 upon this bill. Every man upon that committee knows that that is the fact, and that those are the conditions. After a man has thus voted, and after a matter has been thus considered, I say it is too late to bring in a report and say now, "I was in favor of it, but I have changed the other way." [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division. The committee divided; and there were-ayes 79, noes 101.

Mr. LENROOT. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. Bur-NETT and Mr. LENBOOT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported-ayes 111. noes 90.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill 6060, the immigration bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. HAWLEY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 27289, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from Connecticut will not object, because I have endeavored to see as many Members as I could, and have agreed with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] that we should meet at 11

Mr. DONOVAN. I withdraw the objection, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, February 3, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. NORRIS. I had intended to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution, but I notice the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks] is not in the Chamber, and he requested me not to take it up in his absence.

I ask that the resolution may lie over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

THE CANAL ZONE.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 258), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of the report (with appendices) of the joint commission provided for in our treaty with the Republic of Panama to make awards for damages for property taken by the United States in the Canal Zone, said report having been made in September, 1913, by Dr. L. S. Rowe and Roland P. Falkner, members of said commission for the United States.

THE SOUTH-CENTRAL TEXAS FLOOD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submit the report of S. I. Kimball, general superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, as to the services performed by the Galveston, San Luis, and Velasco life-saving crews, coast of Texas, and persons associated with them, in rescuing and succoring the victims of flood in south-central Texas in December, 1913. I ask that the report be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it examined as to whether it should be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submit an article on the suffrage question in the District of Columbia by George H. Shibley, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing to be considered with a view to its publication as a public document. I know nothing about the merit of the article. I submit it merely for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following act:

S. 541. An act granting to the Emigration Canon Railroad Co., a corporation of the State of Utah, permission, in so far as the United States is concerned, to occupy, for a right of way for its railroad track, a certain piece of land now included in the Mount Olivet Cemetery, Salt Lake County, Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I had determined, although charged by the committee with the duty of presenting its views on the rights of Mr. GLASS to a seat in the Senate, to say nothing in addition to the formal report submitted. I have been moved to depart from this resolution, however, by reason of information which comes to me that a disposition is exhibited among Members on this side of the Chamber, arising from a commendable desire to see every State fully represented here, to disregard the report concurred in by every Democratic member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, except possibly one who asked to be excused from voting. I can not feel that my duty to my associates has been met under the circumstances did I not make a plain statement of the case as it stands at the present time, that Senators may understand fully the meaning and consequences of a vote seating Mr. Glass.

It was contended in his behalf, as the basic proposition upon which his right rests, that a vacancy arising from any cause in the seat of any Senator elected prior to May 31, 1913, is to be filled as provided by the old Constitution-by election by the legislature or temporarily by appointment by the governor. The Senate disposed of that contention forever in the case of Mr. Ler. It held that the amendment governs in the filling of all vacancies; that the old system is gone, relegated to the scrap heap, where it ought to have found oblivion long ago. Mr. LEE has no right here save upon that theory of the Constitution, arrived at by those Members who voted for him under a solemn sense of their obligation under their respective oaths of

There remain two contentions upon which it is claimed that Mr. Glass may be seated without repudiation of the doctrine settled in the case of Mr. Lee. One is that the governor may settled in the case of Mr. Lee. One is that the governor may appoint under a law of the State of Alabama authorizing him to fill vacancies in State offices when there is no way provided specifically for the filling of such—a law which came into existence before the constitutional amendment became valid by ratification, the Federal authority being conferred by the second clause of the amendment, which is in the following words:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such States shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancy by election as the legislature may direct.

In the report submitted it is believed that two propositions are indisputably established leading necessarily to the rejection of this contention. One is that a United States Senator is not a State officer. The other is that the amendment contemplates, indubitably, future affirmative action by the State before the governor can exercise the power of appointment. I do not desire to review or repeal the argument advanced in the report in support of these views. They have never been answered by anyone. There remains but one ground upon which we can seat both the Senator elected from Maryland and the Senator appointed from Alabama. I desire that every Senator shall have, so far as I can help him to secure it, a full appreciation of what the pursuit of that course means. I shall try to state the proposition relied upon accurately, referring to the report for such refutation as may be needed or appropriate. It is argued that the amendment is not self-executing, that though it provides for the election of Senators in the future by the people, no election by the people can take place until legislation, either State or Federal, is enacted for the holding of such election, and that until such legislation is in force the method provided by the old Constitution is to be observed in the election or appointment of Senators.

We know that no Federal legislation has been enacted—the effort in that direction having been interrupted and prevented thus far-and we are told that Alabama has no law which will permit the holding of an election for Senator. It is argued, accordingly, that the old system remains in vogue in Alabama. If you seat Mr. Glass, you affirm that doctrine. You find that condition of the law of Alabama prevails. If there is no law to hold a senatorial election now, there will be no law to hold a senatorial election next fall unless the legislature is convened in extra session meanwhile and it concludes to pass an appropriate law. On the death of Senator Johnston, as is well known, the advice of some of the ablest lawyers in this body was sought as to the proper course to be pursued. The council they gave was to the effect that the legislature ought to be convened to take appropriate action or that an election be

For reasons not fully disclosed this course was not called pursued. It was asserted that an extraordinary number of vacancies existed in the membership of the legislative assembly, and that special elections to fill such vacancies would have to be held before an extra session could be called. I find no warrant in either the constitution or the statutes of Alabama to believe that the legislature can not be legally assembled until vacancies in its membership are filled. Anyway, the difficulty, if any existed, will be no less during the ensuing eight months than it has been during the past eight months. If the claim is true that the legislature can not be assembled because of the vacancies referred to, or, if what seems more likely, it seemed impolitic to assemble it meanwhile, Alabama will be as wanting in a law under which an election can be held next fall as it is now and as it has been since the seventeenth amendment was adopted. This Senate can not seat Mr. Glass now upon the theory that Alabama has no law under which an election can be held and then oust him next fall in favor of a man who is elected under the same state of the law, unless it is prepared to proceed upon the easy philosophy of the statesman who asked, "What is the Constitution among friends?" that he will sit only until an election is held, but the very basis of the argument upon which his right is asserted is that there is no law under which an election can be held. I assert that Alabama has a perfectly adequate law; there never has been any legal reason why an election might not have been held promptly upon the death of the late Senator Johnston without convening the legislature at all.

Reference is made to the statutes in the report of the committee, but I want you to assume that there is no machinery provided by its laws for the conduct of an election. How is one to be conducted next fall? But follow the argument. Until Congress legislates, it is contended, or the State enacts an appropriate law, the old system remains in vogue. The passage of a law by Congress regulating senatorial elections in all the States is by no means certain. The antagonism on this side of the Chamber toward legislation of that character is pronounced. A dread of touching the subject at all, a wholesome dread born of stormy political past, of sectional differences now happily dead, may wholly defeat any bill that embodies or applies effectively the principle of Federal regulation. The doctrine of the seventeenth amendment has not been overwhelmingly popular in the State of Alabama, if that be the inference to be drawn from the fact that she omitted to give it her sanction through appropriate resolution of her legislature. The inference may be unwarranted—it may be unjust to the good people of that State. One of the reasons for adopting the amendment was that State legislatures often fall under the control of forces powerful enough to prevent the sentiment of the States so situated from finding expression in legislative acts. If the State of Alabama continues to maintain the attitude she has observed in the past, either voluntarily or under compulsion as to her legislature, and she should not enact any appropriate laws for holding a senatorial election, she may, under the theory of the Constitution to which you are now asked to give your sanction, continue to elect Members of this body under the old system for a century to come.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WALSH. I do.
Mr. O'GORMAN. Does not the Senator from Montana recognize the fact that the existing laws of the State of Alabama permit the election of United States Senators without any further legislation by the State of Alabama?

Mr. WALSH. I have so stated. Mr. O'GORMAN. I beg pardon. I did not know it had been ated. I only heard the Senator's last statement.

Mr. WALSH. There never has been any reason why they should not have held a senatorial election there.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Montana has just stated that the seventeenth amendment is not popular in Alabama, as is disclosed by the fact that the legislature of that State has not ratified the seventeenth amendment. Does not the Senator from Montana know that the legislature of Alabama has not been in session since the year 1911, and that it has not, therefore, had an opportunity of even considering the question of ratifying or declining to ratify the seventeenth amendment?

Mr. WALSH. The sentiment in favor of the amendment was so strong in my State that, if we were confronted with that condition, our legislature would have been convened in extra session for the purpose of ratifying it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the Senator did know when he made that statement that the Legislature of Alabama had not been in session since 1911?

Mr. WALSH. No; the Senator did not know that.
Mr. ROBINSON. Does he know it now?
Mr. WALSH. The Senator did not know that the Legislature of Alabama had not been in session since the time the amendment was submitted for ratification.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to do so by the Senator from Montana, I would state that it is a fact that the sessions of the Alabama Legislature are quadrennial, and that body has not been in session since the year 1911, approximately two years prior to the announcement by the Secretary of State of the ratification of the seventeenth amendment.

Mr. WALSH. That the condition existed, Mr. President, not-withstanding, is exhibited by the fact that the legislature was not convened in extra session for the purpose of ratifying this important amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH, I do. Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. POINDEXTER. I have been following the Senator's argument with very much interest. If it will not divert him, I should like very much to have the Senator cite the Alabama statute under which an election might have been held.

Mr. WALSH. The statutes are referred to in the report of the committee. I shall be very glad to read them. I read from article 19 of the Code of Alabama, 1907, section

439, in relation to special elections:

439, in relation to special elections:

Special elections—when and for what offices held: Special elections are to be held in the following cases:

1. When a vacancy occurs in the office of senator or representative in the legislature, when the legislature will be in session prior to the next general election for that office.

2. When a vacancy occurs in the office of Representative in the Congress of the United States, by which the State may be deprived of its full representation at any time Congress will be in session prior to the next general election for that office.

3. Whenever any general or special election for members of the legislature or for Representatives in Congress is not held.

4. When any vacancies occur in any State or county offices filled by the election of the people not otherwise provided for by the constitution or laws of this State.

None of those subdivisions as a matter of course cover the

None of those subdivisions, as a matter of course, cover the case of a special election to elect a United States Senator. The legislature, however, was cautious enough to put in this omnibus clause:

5. In such other cases as are or may be provided for by law.

The Constitution provides that the governor shall issue writs of election to fill a vacancy in case one occurs. The power might as well have been expressed in these words:

Whenever a vacancy occurs in the representation from any State the executive authority thereof shall call a special election for the purpose of filling the vacancy.

Accordingly the case is provided for by law, and by the su-preme law of the land, the Constitution of the United States.

When a special election is called, the statute goes on to make provision for taking care of it. Section 440 provides the time:

provision for taking care of it. Section 440 provides the time;

440. Day for holding special elections: All special elections shall be held on such day as the governor may direct.

441. Special elections ordered by governor: All special elections provided for by this article are to be ordered by the governor, who must issue writs of election directed to the sheriffs of the counties in which such election is required to be held; and must specify therein the districts or counties in which, and the day on which, such election is to be held; the cause and object of the same; the name of the person in whose office the vacancy has occurred; and in all cases in which a special election is directed in a district composed of more than one county, such election must be directed to be held on the same day in each county.

445. How conducted and certificates given: Special elections are to be held and conducted, the returns thereof made and certificates given, and, unless otherwise expressly provided, regulated in all respects by the provisions in relation to general elections.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH. I should like to conclude reading the statutes. Mr. BRADLEY. I ask the Senator to yield simply for a question.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to ask the Senator whether or not all he has read in regard to special elections was not passed in 1875?

Mr. WALSH. I find it in the compilation of 1907.
Mr. BRADLEY. I understand that. The Senator finds in that compilation all the statutes which were passed from the beginning.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is right. It is as old as 1875. Mr. BRADLEY. Now, I desire to ask the Senator whether or not in 1909, three years before the adoption of the constitutional amendment, the Legislature of Alabama did not repeal the omnibus clause of that section by passing a bill not only making it the duty of the governor but absolutely requiring that in all cases where vacancies should occur not provided for by law to be filled by election the governor should appoint, and whether or not the law of 1909 does not repeal the omnibus clause of 1875?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not by any possible construction that could be given to the act of 1909. I have the act here, and I shall be very glad to read it for the information of the Senate.

The act to which the Senator from Kentucky refers, I dare say, is as follows, being found on page 13 of the report of the committee:

An act to provide for the filling of any vacant office of the State, or any county, or any municipality, when there is no provision of law for filling such vacancy.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of Alabama:

1. That when any office of the State, of any county, or municipality thereof, is vacant from death, resignation, removal from the municipality, county, or State, or because the former incumbent absconds, or because an incumbent has been removed for ineligibility, or when the office is vacant from any other cause, and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office, the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

My contention is that this statute does not meet the case at all, because this is not a case where there is no law for filling the vacancy. The law—that is, the Constitution—provides that the vacancy shall be filled by election by the people, the governor being commanded by the supreme law of the land to call an election in order that it may be filled.

Now let me read further from section 331 of the general law providing for elections:

State and county officers who are elected by the people: The following officers in this State shall be elected by the qualified electors thereof: Governor, lieutenant governor, attorney general, State auditor, secretary of state, State treasurer, superintendent of education, commissioner of agriculture and industries—

Then it goes on to enumerate a whole lot of officers. Then, recognizing that laws would be passed in the future providing for the election by the people of other officers than those therein enumerated, the section concludes and such other officers as may be required by law to be elected by the

Then section 332:

General election—for whom held: General elections throughout the State shall be held for governor, lieutenant governor, attorney general, State auditor, secretary of state, State treasurer, superintendent of education, commissioner of agriculture and industries, three railroad commissioners, no two of whom shall be elected from the same congressional district; State game and fish commissioner, chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court, supernumerary judge, and electors for President and Vice President of the United States, and such other officers as may be required by law to be elected by the voters of the entire State.

So the whole machinery seems to be provided by these laws

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator construes the basket clause of 1875 as reaching ahead and including the Senatorship, why would not the same basket clause, reaching to the future, include every other possible office, so that there would be no other office to which the governor could make an appointment?

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator could not have been attending to what I have been saying. If a law of the State of Alabama requires, with reference to any specific office, that if a vacancy therein shall occur it shall be filled by election by the people certainly the act of 1909 would not reach it, because the case has been already provided for. On the other hand, if an office were created, and no reference was made in any way to filling a vacancy in that office, it would be filled, under the provisions of the act of 1909, by appointment by the governor. Of course, however, the very fact that the legislature made a specific provision with reference to one particular office to the effect that a vacancy in it should be filled by the people is evidence that it did not desire that it should fall within the basket clause, so to speak, of the act of 1909. So when the people of the United States in the seventeenth amendment provided that vacancies should be filled by election by the people the statute can not possibly cover the

I submit that if the theory of the Constitution to which you are now asked to give your adherence should be recognized by the seating of Mr. Glass, and the proposed national legislation should not pass and the legislature of Alabama should not enact an appropriate law, there is no reason why the State of Alabama could not continue indefinitely to elect her representatives in this body under the system that we supposed had been superseded.

Should an election be held in Alabama during the current year without further legislation, upon what theory will you admit the candidate who comes as the choice of the people thus expressed, if you now seat Mr. GLASS? That State is not equipped to hold a senatorial election, and therefore the new plan contemplated by the amendment has not yet become effec-

I confess myself an uncompromising supporter of the seventeenth amendment. I shared in the general impatience arising from the extraordinary delay in its adoption, in spite of the unmistakable public sentiment by which it was demanded. About me are many of the men whose incessant labors eventually forced it from a resourceful and stubborn minority, skilled in all the arts by which necessary reforms are exasperatingly delayed and eventually defeated.

Why were not the people of Alabama given an opportunity to elect their Senator as was contemplated when the amendment finally, after many years of effort, became valid as a part of the Constitution? It was just such subterfuges, operating to defeat the will of the people or to prevent them from expressing their will, that gave strength to the public demand for a change of the method of electing Senators, until it acquired such force and volume as to sweep away all opposition like an on-rushing tide.

We did well to commend the people of Maryland for their patriotism in recognizing the seventeenth amendment as the law of the land, and we ought to say to Alabama: "Go thou and do likewise.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the case of Mr. Glass, who claims a seat as United States Senator from Alabama, is in many respects unusual. Senator Johnston, who was chosen for the term beginning March 4, 1909, and ending March 4, 1915, died August 8, 1913, a few months after the ratification of the seventeenth amendment had been formally announced. The governor of Alabama assumed to make a temporary appointment to fill the vacancy. The credentials of his appointee, Hon. Henry D. Clayton, were presented to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Hearings were had by the committee and arguments submitted touching the power of the governor of Alabama to make the appointment. No report was made by the committee to the Senate. Mr. Clayton subsequently declined the appointment and the governor of Alabama then appointed Mr. Glass, whose credentials were likewise referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The majority of that committee have submitted a report accompanied by a resolution to the effect that Mr. GLASS is not entitled to be seated. A minority report has been made recommending that Mr. Glass This resolution reported by the majority of the be seated. committee is based on the theory that the governor had no power to make the appointment, and that the only legal way in which the vacancy can be filled is by special election.

Believing that upon the whole case the report of the majority of the committee should not be agreed to and that Mr. Glass should be seated, I take the liberty of presenting some of the reasons which impel me to this conclusion.

APPOINTMENT MADE IN GOOD FAITH.

It has nowhere been claimed that Gov. O'Neal, in assuming to make this appointment, has acted otherwise than in good faith and from a sense of duty. All of the local authorities in Alabama—the attorney general of that State, the governor's official legal adviser, and many eminent lawyers, including the Hon. Hannis Taylor, a recognized authority on constitutional law, familiar with the statutes of Alabama and the constructions given to them by the highest court of that State—have advised Gov. O'Neal that he had the power to make the appointment and that it was his duty to do so. Nor does the case here involve any conflicting claim to the seat sought by Mr. Glass. No other person asserting a right to be seated as Senator from Alabama contests the title of Mr. Glass. If his credentials are rejected, Alabama will for at least some period be represented in the Senate by only one Member. The case involves no opposition to the seventeenth amendment, but rather the proper construction and application of its provisions. What is the duty of the Senate in the exercise of its exclusive power to determine the right of Mr. Glass to a seat in this body?

The majority report of the committee seems to rest its conclusion on three affirmative propositions:

1. That in no case can a vacancy of the Senate arising after the adoption of the seventeenth amendment be filled otherwise than by an adoption of the seventeenth amendment be filled otherwise than by an election.

2. That the provision of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution requiring the executive authority of a State to issue writs of election to fill vacancies in the Senate is self-executing.

3. That even if legislation is necessary to carry into effect the provision of the seventeenth amendment relating to the filling of vacancies in the Senate by special election, under the fifth subdivision of the Alabama Code providing for special elections "in such other cases as are or may be provided for by law," the governor should have called an election, and such election could have been held for the purpose of filling the vacancy involved in this case.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections includes some of the most eminent lawyers in this body. They have not agreed as to the principles of law applicable in the proper determinaas to the principles of law applicable in the proper determina-tion of the Glass case. Both sides of the contention are pre-sented to the Senate with great force. There is a conflict be-tween the position of the majority of the committee, as expressed by Mr. Walsh, and that of the minority, as set forth in its report and in the views of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley]. From the nature of the issue no question of discourtesy to the Committee on Privileges and Elections can be implied from a failure of the Senate to concur in their report. The subject will be determined free from personal influence of members of the committee, whose character and reputation for impartiality and justice are so far above reproach or question that mere pride of opinion on their part can not become a factor in the solution of this case.

It is believed that the three propositions upon which the case in opposition to Mr. GLASS seems to rest are open to grave doubt and are by no means conclusive. To avoid repetition, which might otherwise be necessary, let us first consider the propo-

ARE THE PROVISIONS OF THE SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT EXPRESSLY RELATING TO THE FILLING OF VACANCIES IN THE SENATE SELF-EXE-CUTING?

The language of the amendment germane to this inquiry is as follows:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such States shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive authority thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancy by election as the legislature may direct.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley] contends that this provision applies only to the filling of vacancies where the original Senator in a given term has been chosen under the new amendment—that is, by elections of the people. The weight of the argument seems to me to support his position. But, conceding that the provision applies to the filling of all vacancies, it is clear that legislative action is contemplated. If the governor makes a temporary appointment, the legislature must "empower" the governor to make that appointment; if an election is held, the legislature must "direct" the manner of the election. The language is:

Until the people fill the vacancy by election as the legislature may

I am not now discussing the question as to whether, if existing legislation in any State authorizes the governor to make a temporary appointment or is sufficiently comprehensive to provide a means and manner of holding an election, such statutes may be availed of. That is reserved for the present. The express language of the Constitution contemplates legislative authority to fill vacancies in the Senate whether filled by appointment or by election. The language above quoted is clear. So it would seem that the framers of the amendment designed that the same should not be self-executing in the strict sense of that term. As to when a constitutional provision is self-executing no general rule applicable to all cases can be expressed. It is sufficient in this connection to say that the mere declaration that "the executive authority of a State shall issue writs of election" was not designed to be enforced and can not be enforced save in either one of two instances, namely, first, unless the legislature in contemplation of the amendment has provided by law the necessary means or machinery for holding the election before the amendment was adopted, or, second, provided the same after the amendment has been adopted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield. Mr. REED. If it will not disturb the line of the Senator's thought, I wish to ask a question in regard to the self-executing feature or doctrine implied in the seventeenth amendment. Does the Senator hold that after the adoption of the seventeenth amendment the language I am about to read does not necessarily strike down any other method of election than that provided in the provision, namely:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years.

Now, does the Senator think that that requires any legislative act in order to make it effective and binding?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not.

Mr. REED. Then that part is self-executing, because it does not require any legislative act. We then reach the conclusion that the only way a man can now obtain title to his seat is by an election, unless there is something else found in the provision which qualifies that right. I think the Senator will agree with me in that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall be very glad to have the Senator conclude his statement or ask his question.

Mr. REED. I was asking a question. Mr. ROBINSON. When the Senator has asked his question I will try to answer it. What is the question the Senator from

I will try to answer it. What is the question the Senator from Missouri propounds to me?

Mr. REED. The Senator states that the language of the seventeenth amendment, which provides that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years," is self-executing. Now, that being admitted—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am discussing the clause of the seventeenth amendment relating to the filling of vacancies and if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me. I prefer cies, and if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, I prefer not to be diverted from the line of my discussion. I do not think the question which the Senator from Missouri has propounded to me is directly connected with the subject I am discussing.

Mr. President, I decline to yield further at this time. Mr. REED. Very well. I thought the Senator was willing to be interrupted.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language of the amendment precludes any contrary construction. Indeed, it seems literally to contemplate future legislation. The legislature may empower the governor to appoint-* * * to fill a vacancy until the people fill it by election, as the legislature may direct.

In view of this language, how can it be established that the governor must call an election and, as incident to his power to do this, provide the time, the place, and manner of holding the election?

Giving to the cases referred to in the report of the majority of the committee very liberal effect, it can not be fairly claimed that the Congress intended that the governor of a State should exercise legislative powers, create election machinery, and dictate the places for holding elections and the manner of conducting the same. These must be provided by legislative authority. If that already exists, it may be availed of. If not, the legislature must act. The governor can not do it. So that thority. under the terms of the amendment itself the necessity for legislative authority, either existing before the adoption of the amendment and in contemplation of it, or enacted subsequent to the ratification of the amendment, is required.

IS THE FIFTH SUBDIVISION OF THE ALABAMA CODE, SECTION 430, PROVIDING FOR SPECIAL ELECTIONS "IN SUCH OTHER CASES AS MAY BE PROVIDED FOR BY LAW," APPLICABLE TO FILLING VACANCIES IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE?

This statute was passed by the Alabama Legislature March 3, 1875. At that time no amendment to the Federal Constitution changing the manner of electing Senators was pending, nor was such an amendment under discussion or, in fact, contemplated. In a Connecticut case it was held that an election statute providing the means and manner of giving effect to a constitutional amendment, passed after said amendment to the constitution hal been submitted, could fairly be said to have been enacted in contemplation of the amendment, even though the amendment had not been ratified when the act was passed. This is as far as the authorities seem to go. I have found no case which warrants the conclusion that the Alabama act of 1875 can be considered as having been passed in contemplation of the seventeenth amendment. It was enacted 40 years prior to the ratification of the seventeenth amendment, and there was then no discussion of such amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana. Mr. WALSH. The Senator now argues that the Alabama code is not adequate for holding an election.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I argued that the Alabama statute was not passed in contemplation of the seventeenth amendment. Mr. WALSH. And that it will not permit the holding of an

Mr. ROBINSON. That in all probability that is true,

Mr. WALSH. Then, of course, they can not hold an election until the legislature acts.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is a matter which can be determined hereafter. That is for Alabama, of course. I shall discuss that before I conclude, if the opportunity is presented.

If in legal effect it was in contemplation of the seventeenth amendment, then every legislative act may be said to have in contemplation all constitutional amendments relating to a kindred subject matter, however remote in time the same may be submitted and ratified.

If there were no legislation in Alabama touching the filling of vacancies subsequent to the act of 1875, it is doubtful, as I think I have shown, whether the same was intended to apply to the filling of a vacancy in the United States Senate. But this is not the case. The act of 1909, passed by the Legislature of Alabama while the agitation for a constitutional amendment providing for the popular election of Senators was nation wide, gives the governor the power to fill vacancies by appointment. Under the construction given these statutes of Alabama, the governor now fills all vacancies by appointments.

The language of the act of 1909—germane to this contro-

When any office of the State * * is vacant from death, * * o r when the office is vacant from any other cause and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office, the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

It is respectfully submitted that this statute supersedes the act of 1875. If the latter statute can be held to have been adopted in contemplation of the seventeenth amendment, the same is much more clearly proved as to the act of 1909. If the act of 1875 contemplated an election to fill a vacancy from Alabama, certainly the act of 1909 authorizes and requires the governor to fill that vacancy by appointment, unless the office of United States Senator is not equally comprehended in the term "office of the State" as in the provision contained in the act of 1875, "in such other cases as are or may be provided for by law." Under the authority of Elliott v. Freeman (220 U. S., 178) and Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick (90 N. Y., 185) the words "provided by law" seem to mean "provided by statute," and do not mean by a writ of election.

While the Alabama statute purports to authorize the governor to make appointments to fill the unexpired term, if it conflicts with that provision in the seventeenth amendment which provides for appointments by the governor to hold "until the people fill the vacancies by election," under the authority of Neal v. Delaware (103 U. S., 370), the appointee of the governor of Alabama, Mr. Glass, would serve "until the people fill the vacancy by election"; that is, the constitutional provision would control. The constitution and laws of Delaware provided for elections by "white male citizens." The Neal case arose after the adoption of the fifteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, providing that no person shall be denied the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the provisions of the fifteenth amendment were self-executing, and superseded, or in effect amended, the constitution and laws of Delaware so as to read out of them the word "white."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Burton's case, expressly held that a United States Senator is not a "civil officer under the United States." A Senator is chosen by the State which he represents, receives his commission from it, and resigns to it and not to any authority of the United States. course, a United States Senator is not a military officer of the United States, and since the Supreme Court has held that he is not a civil officer of the United States, the conclusion follows that he is an officer of the State which chooses and commissions

The local authorities in Alabama—the governor, the attorney general, and the governor's legal adviser-have thus construed the statutes of that State, and their construction of these statutes should have controlling consideration here. The Supreme Court of the United States recognizes this principle. accepts the construction of State statutes by State courts as conclusive. If this case is controlled by the Alabama statute, the local construction of them should govern. This doctrine is well established and almost universally recognized.

If statutes passed by Alabama 40 years before the adoption of the seventeenth amendment can be invoked in aid of this provision of the seventeenth amendment, certainly the statute of 1909, passed while the subject was being agitated, is equally if not more applicable. In any view Alabama authorities construe Alabama statutes and Federal authorities follow their construction. So that even if the provisions of the amendment referred to apply to the filling of all vacancies in the United States Senate, Mr. Glass is entitled to be seated. And herein lies the radical and important distinction between this case and the Lee case.

Conceding, if you please, the position taken by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Mr. LEE from Maryland, still under that decision and under that precedent, if it constitutes such, Mr. Glass is entitled to be seated, because under the Alabama construction of the Alabama statutes the governor of that State was authorized to make the appointment. There can be nothing inconsistent in giving it this construction. The seventeenth amendment itself expressly authorizes the legislature to empower the goveror of any State to make such an appointment. Under the doctrine asserted by the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if the Legislature of Alabama has already empowered the governor of Alabama to make the appointment, then there is no necessity for subsequent action. If they can invoke that principle as to the election, why can it not be invoked with equal propriety and force as to an appointment? The seventeenth amendment recognizes both manners of filling vacancies as to the term of Senators chosen after the amendment was adopted.

Even this does not conclude the case of Mr. Glass. We assert with confidence that the third clause of the seventeenth amendment expressly excepts such cases from its provisions; that the vacancy in Senator Johnston's term is properly temporarily filled by appointment of the governor. The language of this clause is:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the * * * erm of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

All that I have heretofore said in support of the claim of Mr. Glass to a seat in the Senate has been based upon the proposition that, even if the provisions of the second clause of the seventeenth amendment are applicable to the filling of all vacancies, Mr. Glass is entitled to be seated because that provision of the amendment authorizes the governor to appoint when empowered to do so by the legislature, and the Legislature of Alabama has empowered the governor of the State, by the statute of 1909, passed in contemplation of the seventeenth amendment, to make the appointment. Mr. Glass is thus entitled to be seated, even though his case does not come within the exceptions contained in the third clause of the seventeenth amendment. I shall now attempt to show that under the facts and circumstances of this case he should be seated, for the reason that the amendment itself, fairly construed, leaves the old provision of the Constitution in force as to his case. If any effect is to be given to this third clause of the seventeenth amendment, this conclusion seems unavoidable.

The exemption operates on the "election" and the "term." and not on the person. No one contends that Members sitting in the Senate when the amendment was ratified are required to be elected by popular vote. It is admitted that they may serve under the old provision of the Constitution until the end of their terms,

The words "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election * of any Senator chosen before the amendment becomes valid as part of the Constitution" makes clear the intention of the framers of the amendment and of the people in adopting it not to give the amendment a retroactive effect. What do the words "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the * * * term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution" mean?

They must be given some meaning. It is a primary rule, applicable to the construction of statutes and constitutional provisions, that effect must be given to all the words employed; that words are presumed to have been used in their plain, natural, and ordinary meaning. This rule can not be lightly discarded. The framers of the amendment, in legal contemplation, had it in mind when the amendment was prepared. If the third clause, above quoted, was intended only to relieve sitting Members from the necessity of becoming candidates during their term, there was no necessity for porating it in the amendment. The amendment would not have had a retroactive effect if the third clause had been omitted. Its insertion means something. Every word must be given a meaning. Not only is the "election" of Senators chosen before the amendment became valid excepted, but also their "terms." What is the "term" of a Senator? Practically—

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—
Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.
Mr. WALSH. That part of the argument can not endure, of course, consistently with the seating of Mr. Lee. Is the Senator mow arguing that Mr. Lee had no right here because—Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, Mr. President, I am not making any such argument. I decline to yield further to the Senator to make a statement of that kind in the remarks that I am making.

I stated when the Lee case was under consideration by the Senate of the United States that I thought, under all the circumstances of the case, Mr. Lee ought to be seated, because a conflict as to the proper construction of the amendment which the Congress had submitted to the people had arisen, and the people of Maryland had expressed their choice, and that I was unwilling, on a technical construction of an amendment which had been made ambiguous by my own stupidity, to deny any State the right of representation in the Senate of the United States. I am arguing now that, first, under the principles of the Lee case, Mr. Glass is entitled to be seated, if you give full force and effect to the local construction of the Alabama statutes which the Supreme Court and other Federal authorities are inclined to follow. Then I am arguing, in addition to that, that the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh], if you please, was wrong when he reached the conclusion, and asserted with very great force, that the seventeenth amendment contemplates an election to fill a vacancy in the term of a Senator chosen before the amendment became valid.

Mr. WALSH. I do not like to bother the Senator from Arkansas, but I should simply like to inquire whether, in the opinion of the Senator, the Senate can adopt that part of his argument consistently with the seating of Mr. Lee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not undertake, Mr. President, to pass upon a question of consistency or inconsistency; that is always for Senators themselves. The Senate is the sole judge of this question, and it can decide it as it thinks right under all the circumstances of the case.

Practically all the cases hold that it is the definite and fixed period of six years for which United States Senators are chosen. The President of the United States is chosen for a term of four years; Representatives in Congress for a term of two years; and Members of the Senate for a term of six years. In law and in fact, the "terms" of these officers are distinct from the incumbents of the office. If President Wilson should resign, his term as President would continue until the 4th of March, 1917. If a Member of the House of Representatives should die or resign, there would arise a vacancy in his term, but the "term" would continue to exist until the end of the two-year period for which he was chosen. So with Senators. Senator Johnston's term began March 4, 1909. It will not expire until March 4, 1915. If Mr. Glass is seated he will serve a part of this term. theory is supported by practically all the authorities.

The word "term," when used in reference to the tenure of

The word "term," when used in reference to the tenure of office, means a fixed and definite time. (People v. Le Fevre, 40 Pac., 882; Jameson v. Hudson, 82 Va., 281; Crovatt v. Mason, 28 S. Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BOBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.
Mr. POMERENE. If I understand the Senator's argument, it is this: That the term of the late Senator Johnston continues, irrespective of the fact that he has departed from us?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. Thomas] was elected to fill and is now serving for the unexpired term of the late Senator from Colorado, Mr. Hughes, who died before the seventeenth amendment was adopted. Under the construction which the Senator from Arkansas is giving to the third clause of the seventeenth amendment, then the Senator from Colorado is serving without a term?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly, he is serving in the term of Senator Hughes; and if the Senator from Ohio has not gone into the question, I will say that, if he will examine it, he will find that there is absolutely no conflict among the authorities as to this proposition. The term takes its name, I will say to the Senator from Ohio, from the initial Senator who served in the term, and it is in that term, the term of the late Senator Hughes of Colorado or the term of the late Senator Johnston of Alabama, accordingly as they were the first Senators chosen in the terms

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have gone very thoroughly into that proposition, and I very much regret that I am not able to agree with the Senator's construction.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is a very rare thing when the Senator from Ohio and I do not agree, and it is a matter of regret to me that he has reached a conclusion as to that feature of this matter which is not at all, in my judgment, justified by the authorities which are applicable to the propo-

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will permit me, I will say that I can not conceive of any human being occupying a seat on the floor of the Senate without his serving a term.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Whose term?

Mr. POMERENE. His own term.

Mr. ROBINSON. A great many Senators serve in this body who do not serve a term. There may be, in the theory of the law, any number of Senators serving in a given term. illustrate. My predecessor in the Senate—Senator Davis, of Arkansas—died about January 2, 1913. The governor of the State of Arkansas appointed Mr. Heiskell, who served about one week; and, the legislature then having convened in regular session, Mr. W. M. Kavanaugh was elected; and so we had three Senators in one term; but, in contemplation of law, it was the term of Senator Davis, the term which began at a fixed time and the term which ended at a fixed time-March 4, 1913.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—
Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.
Mr. POMERENE. Then, I take it, from the construction which the Senator from Arkansas has placed upon the third clause of the seventeenth amendment, that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Thomas] would not have any protection what-ever under the seventeenth amendment in his title to his office?

Mr. ROBINSON. As suggested to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Williams], he would have protection outside of it. But, Mr. President, I must decline hereafter to be diverted to the discussion of hypothetical cases. I am now discussing the case before the Senate of the United States, the case of Mr. Frank P. Glass, who comes to this body with the certificate of the governor of a sovereign State, and requests to be admitted as a representative of that State. The State has construed the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and construed it in good faith; and, surely, it must be admitted that there is an ambiguity in the amendment, because lawyers in this body have differed widely as to the proper construction of the amendment. I want to go back, now, to the proposition that I was discussing before I was interrupted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to say that, in the determination of the courts with relation to changes in the compensation of officers, the universal decisions, as I recall them, have been to the effect that when a change of compensation has been made it takes effect at the end of the term and not because the office may be filled by a new officer.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Colorado has reenforced my argument. There are almost numberless cases to that effect. Constitutional provisions that the compensation of an officer shall neither be increased nor diminished during the term for which he has been elected have been almost universally, I believe, with a single exception, construed to mean the fixed period of law for which he was chosen. He may die or resign and any number of incumbents may serve during the period, still, until the end of the period for which he was chosen, the compensation must remain the same as that fixed for the first incumbent.

I am going to put into the RECORD a number of authorities which, I think, support this doctrine. It is merely one feature of this case. No lawyer in presenting a case to a court or a jury rests his case, as a rule, upon any single proposition. I say that this feature of the case is worthy of consideration, even though such eminent lawyers and authorities as the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] and others who agree with him in his construction of it differ from the construction that is now being placed on it by your humble speaker.

The authorities are overwhelming and conclusive that the ordinary meaning of the word "term" when applied to the tenure of office means the fixed and definite period for which an officer is chosen. The conclusion is therefore irresistible that under the third clause of the seventeenth amendment that amendment does not "affect" the term for which Senator

Johnston was chosen.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President— Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina. Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator if his argument leads him to the conclusion that until the end of the term for which Senator Johnston was elected the seventeenth amendment does not take effect, and that the vacancy during that period would have to be of necessity filled in the old way-that is, by the legislature-instead of by an election by the people?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment takes effect in its exception. The exception is as much a part of the amendment as any other feature of it. It is a conclusion of the argument which I am now presenting that until the end of Senator Johnston's term, namely, March 4, 1915, any Senator chosen to represent Alabama should be chosen after the old method prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that if a term began last March and the incumbent should die, for the next six years, under the Senator's argument, there could be no election to fill that term by the people; it would have to be filled by the legislature at any time within six years?

Mr. ROBINSON. If the legislature had provided for it, there could probably be an election in case of a vacancy unless the initial Senator in the term was chosen before the amendment became valid.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I understood the Senator's argument to be that the amendment had no effect upon a term which had been begun before the ratification of the amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; that is not the gist of my argument. The "beginning" of the term does not govern.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am asking the Senator if his argument leads him to that conclusion?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not at all; my argument leads to this conclusion: Where a Senator is chosen before the amendment became effective, vacancies in his term shall be filled according to the old Constitution under the third clause of the seventeenth amendment. If you give it any effect at all, it is difficult to see how you can escape that conclusion.

What is the correct meaning of the word "affect"? In most of the cases it means "act upon, or concern." If the seven-teenth amendment does not "act upon" the "term" of Senator Johnston, it becomes clear that vacancies in that term are to be filled without regard to it-filled under the old provision of the Constitution.

It has been suggested that the word "affect" as used in this connection merely means that it shall not lengthen or shorten. When it is remembered that this is a restricted meaning of the term, and that the seventeenth amendment expressly preserves the six-year senatorial term in clause 1 by the following lan-

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for the term of six years.

The force of this suggestion is weakened or destroyed. There are a great many ways of "affecting" a term besides shortening or lengthening it. A change in the manner of filling a vacancy in a term is one of them. If the ordinary rules of construction are observed, full effect will be given to all the provisions of the amendment. No phrase or word will be discarded. Every word can be given its ordinary meaning. Every public interest will thus be conserved, inconvenience and confusion will be avoided, no interference or interruption in the course of public business will occur, and the new system of electing Senators by popular vote will be harmoniously substituted for the old method. The practical as well as the legal view of this case prompts the admission of Mr. Glass to a seat in this body.

The Washington Post, in an editorial published February 2, 1914, strongly supports the right of Mr. Glass to be seated.

It is as follows:

ALABAMA'S SENATORSHIP.

When the Senate votes to-day on the question whether or not Frank P. Glass should be seated as Senator from Alabama it is to be hoped that common sense will triumph over technicalities. When the amendment permitting the direct election of Senators was adopted it was not intended that any State should be robbed of representation in the Senate while the new law was getting under way.

The Senate itself did not foresee that more than one construction might be placed upon the amendment. The obvious intent was to provide an easy and understandable method for direct elections by the people. Pending such elections, however, it was intended that each State should continue to be represented by two Senators.

Alabama, under a technical construction of the amendment, is being deprived of one of its two votes in the Senate. Viewing the matter practically, Senator Bankhead is being compelled to do the work of two men simply because of a technicality which might be brushed aside without creating any dangerous precedent for the future, since this situation can never arise again.

Why should the Senate hesitate to get down beneath the confused verbiage and find out what was intended by the amendment? This is the method pursued invariably by the courts, and it is the only way to make sure that justice will be done. There can be no error in this case, because the Senate debated the proposition when the amendment was under consideration, and need only to ask itself what was intended. Whatever may be said on behalf of placing the letter over the spirit of the act, the Senate should keep in mind that if it decides against Mr. Glass the result will be that Alabama will have but one Senator from now until next November, when the senatorial contest in the State will be decided. Mr. Glass holds the commission from the governor of his State. There is no question with regard to his character. There is no protest of any kind from his own State. He should be seated.

Surely those who have some doubt as to the proper construction of the seventeenth amendment, those inclined to adopt the views of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, will give consideration to the fact that Alabama is entitled to two Senators; that the seventeenth amendment was not intended and should not be construed to deprive a sovereign State of the right to equal representation in the Senate. If we have prepared and submitted an amendment as to the meaning of which we ourselves do not agree; if, in drafting the amendment, we were so lacking either in caution or in intelligence as to fail to clearly express our own purpose and intention, would it not be absurd to deny the State of Alabama, whose authorities have merely given force and effect to local construction of the statutes of that State, the privelege of having two Senators by merely technical construction, when we are forbidden to do this by an express provision of the Constitution?

Every consideration of public policy, just regard for the rights of Alabama, and recognition of the spirit of the Constitution as a whole, prompts us to resolve any doubt that may arise as to the legal meaning of the amendment in favor of the

Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I was not attempting to interrupt the Senator from Arkansas. I was about to follow him up.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question if I may.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to be recognized in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator allow the proposed substitute to be first stated?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the substitute proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] for the resolution reported by the committee.

The Secretary. In lieu of the resolution reported by the majority of the committee it is proposed to substitute the follow-

Resolved, That Frank P. Glass is entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Alabama.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have yielded the floor. Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to propound a question to the Senator from Arkansas. Mr. ROBINSON. I shall be glad to answer it if I can. Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I find no answer in my mind to the argument the Senator has made.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I can not resist the conclusion he has drawn, and, as a suggestion, I will inquire what is there in any word of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution that would have led this body to believe at the time it acted upon the amendment that without the clause providing that the term should not be affected a term could be shortened or could be lengthened?

Mr. ROBINSON. Absolutely nothing. There is no lawyer living who could make such a contention.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If you are going to give the word "affect" the sense of shortening or lengthening a term, there was no use of inserting it, for there is nothing in the amendment that they might fear from that at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Therefore something was meant when the language was used, "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator"; but it did not mean either lengthening or shortening the term, and, as the Senator has said, it must have meant something else.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is certainly true, in my judgment. Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this case is to be decided by the language of the seventeenth amendment. It is to be decided by the language of the seventeenth amendment, in so far as that changed the forum in which a Senator is elected, and it is to be decided by the language of the seventeenth amendment in so far as that amendment makes exceptions to the general rule which the amendment itself lays down.

The amendment itself is not a very long one. I can read it to you in the five minutes I intend to take:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State

That is the old Constitutionelected by the people thereof, for six years-

That is the new Constitution, under the seventeenth amendment-and each Senator shall have one vote.

That is the old Constitution.

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

That is the old Constitution, repeated.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

That is the new Constitution.

Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.

That is the old and new Constitution. Then there follows this language:

This amendment-

All of the amendment; not a part of it, but all of itshall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

If the framers of the seventeenth amendment had meant only to affect the manner of election of Senators, they would have stopped at the langer ege, "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election of any Senator chosen," but they did not stop there. They said, "The election, or term, of any Senator chosen."

The term is a definite thing in this particular body. It may be the term of Williams, of Mississippi, or of Poindexter, of Washington, or of Brandegee, of Connecticut. It may be whatever it may be; but the seventeenth amendment itself provides that nothing in any part of the amendment shall affect either the election or the term of the Senator-elect.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] a moment ago thought he had discovered a matter of inconsistency between this and the decision of the Senate in the Blair Lee case. I find none, so far as I am concerned. If the governor of Maryland had appointed Mr. BLAIR LEE a Senator in this body, I should have recognized his right to take a seat here; but the governor of Maryland chose rather to leave his appointment in abeyance, subject to a popular election, which he had a perfect right to do.

I remember that several times when I was a Member of the House, with the right to designate postmasters, I said: "I will designate as postmaster at X, Y, or Z the man who shall be elected by the patrons of the office." That was not denying at all my right to appoint. That was merely holding in abeyance my right, subject to a condition which I myself fixed.

Here is a definite senatorial term of six years. I want to call your attention to the common sense of the proposition-not its mere legalities nor its technicalities.

The tail end of a term is just as much part of the term as the beginning of the term. The tail end of a term in which a vacancy is created by resignation, death, or anything else leading to a vacancy, whenever it is created, is a part of the term, and it does not make any difference whether it is the beginning of the term or the end of it. The seventeenth amendment provides that "the term" shall not be affected, and it no more provides that the beginning of the term, the initial point at which the man was chosen by the legislature, shall not be affected than it provides that the tail end of the term, in which a vacancy is created by the happening of death or resignation, shall not be affected. It provides that neither shall be "affected."

It seems to me that when you leave mere law aside you can come to but one conclusion about this matter. I am a lawyer. My father was one. His father and his grandfather were lawyers, and my grandfather's grandfather was one, and as far back as I know they were all lawyers; so I have no feeling at all against "the tribe." It is my tribe, in a way, although for some 16 or 18 years I have left the tribe. I have no prejudice against them, except that as a rule a lawyer's intellect is narrow. It shakes aside common sense, it shakes aside phil-osophy and ethics, and proceeds to decide things upon technicalities of one description or another.

What is the real thing here? It is primarily and above all the right of a State to be represented in this body. That is the main thing. How it is to be represented is a minor thing.

Then the law undertakes to provide, first in the old Constitution and secondly in the seventeenth amendment, which is part of the new Constitution, as to how the State shall be represented !

here. In undertaking to provide for that, it says that it shall be represented by two Senators, each entitled to one vote, holding their offices for six years, and that they shall be elected, under the new Constitution, instead of being chosen by the legislature, under the old Constitution.

Then it comes to the question of vacancies. First it operates upon the new terms taking effect after its adoption and then the old terms not affected by the amendment. All of those must take effect under the seventeenth amendment, to be elected, subject to what?

Subject even there to a certain provision, that-

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

So much for the new terms beginning under the new Constituition-under the seventeenth amendment. They must be filled by writs of election issued by the governor, as a part of this amendment:

Provided further, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment.

That refers to what shall take place after the new Constitution—the seventeenth amendment—becomes self-operative. You may reply, "But the entire amendment is self-operative." In a certain sense that is true. The entire amendment executes itself; but it executes itself according to its own terms, not according to my terms or your terms, nor my phraseology nor yours, but according to its phraseology; and in executing itself this language occurs:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election r term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Senator Johnston's term in Alabama was a term for which he was chosen before the seventeenth amendment "became valid as part of the Constitution." Whatever the lawyers may say, splitting hairs between the north and northwest side, as is their habit, the plain common sense of the proposition is this:

First, Alabama has a right to representation in this body. Secondly, the term of Senator Johnston, which was a term outside of the purview of this amendment, taking its legal effect before the amendment became valid as a part of the Constitution, is not affected by the terms of the seventeenth amendment.

Not being affected by the terms of the seventeenth amendment, the vacancy in the term created by death-the tail end of the term being just as valid as the initial end of it-is subject to the laws of the State of Alabama, they being subject in their terms to the Constitution of the United States at the time they were passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state that prior to the recognition of the Senator from Mississippi the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. Thompson] addressed the Chair and in the confusion that followed the Chair overlooked The Chair thinks the Senator from Kansas is enthe fact. titled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That being the case, I wish to add my apology to the explanation of the Chair. I did not know it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No blame attaches to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield until I can address a question to the Senator from Mississippi,

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I am very sure this subject has been approached by the Senator from Mississippi in the statesmanlike way in which all these questions are considered by him. He has not, however, been quite so clear as usually he is in the discussion of these public questions, or at least if he has been, I have been dull, because I have been unable to gather from what the Senator has said whether his opinion is that by virtue of the last clause of the amendment vacancies are to be filled in the manner prescribed by the old Constitution or in the manner prescribed by the amendment.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Vacancies in terms?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Vacancies in terms created before the new Constitution took effect-or the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, thereby creating a new Constitution-are, in my opinion, to be filled under the terms of the old Constitution.

Mr. WALSH. Then, I should like to ask the Senator how we can permit Senator Lee of Maryland to sit here, who never was chosen as provided by the old Constitution, either by election or by appointment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because Senator Lee came here by virtue of a law of the State of Maryland, enacted in accord with the old Constitution, which provided for filling a vacancy in the term that was created for Senator Rayner. I find no inconsistency at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I have taken great interest in the several election cases which have come before it recently for consideration and have given much study to the legal questions involved. I have carefully examined the authorities cited on both sides of the controversies. There is no great difference in the fundamental principles involved in the three cases of CLAYTON, GLASS, and LEE which have been presented to the committee.

The first case to be presented was that of Hon. Henry D. Clayton, appointed by the governor of Alabama to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Joseph F. Johnston. Senator Johnston's full term would not have expired until March 4, 1915. Before Mr. CLAYTON's credentials were acted upon by the committee they were withdrawn by him; and subsequently, on the 7th day of November, 1913, the governor of Alabama appointed Hon. Frank P. Glass to fill such vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Johnston.

After a very able presentation of the legal questions involved by the attorneys and friends of both candidates and after a most thorough consideration of the cases by the committee the committee arrived at the conclusion that the governor of Alabama had no authority under the Constitution of the United States to make an appointment, and that therefore Mr. Glass is not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh], who had written a most exhaustive and able opinion expressing his views in the Clayton case, and who on many occasions has demonstrated his great ability as a lawyer, upon request made the report for the committee and filed with it his written opinion, with which I fully concur in all its essential features and conclu-The opinion, from a legal standpoint, as I view the matter, is conclusive on this question and is unanswerable.

After all, in all the cases the principal question to be considered is whether or not the seventeenth amendment to the Con-stitution, providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, became in full force and effect and in full operation throughout the United States when it was proclaimed as a part of the Constitution on the 31st day of May, 1913. The seventeenth amendment reads as follows:

May, 1913. The seventeenth amendment reads as follows:
The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.
When vacancles happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such States shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancy by election as the legislature may direct.

direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of or term of any the Constitution,

In the construction of the Constitution or statutes we have right to take into consideration all the surrounding facts and circumstances leading up to their adoption, and also the result to which any particular construction leads or may lead. For more than 20 years we discussed throughout the country the question of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. For the last few years it was one of the most vital things uppermost in the minds of the American people. It was brought about by the frauds and scandals which had characterized some of the elections by the State legislatures, and the fact that in some States it became almost impossible to even elect a Senator by the old process. No sooner was a State legislature elected until the various candidates for the Senate began all sorts of schemes to secure votes of the members of the legislature. It became so disgusting that the people finally concluded to do away with the old method entirely and place these elections within their own hands, where they rightly belonged.

The subject became a crystallized movement throughout the country, and the two-thirds vote of Congress was finally given, and the ratification of the necessary three-fourths of the States easily obtained to secure the amendment. In many States they became impatient and could not wait for the amendment and adopted makeshifts, commonly known as the "Oregon plan," in order to require an election of Senators by the people pending the amendment. In my own State of Kansas we had just adopted the "Oregon plan," under which I was elected just before the constitutional amendment was finally adopted. In my case, according to the old system, an attempt was even made by a few political traitors to overturn the vote of the people and to secure an election under the old plan; but the more this was advocated the stronger my candidacy grew, so that finally I received practically the unanimous election by the legislature, legislature disregard the will of the people as expressed at the polls could now hope to be elected to any office, high or low, although I understand some of the parties even now aspire to the Senate. All of which goes to show that this sentiment is a settled conviction among the voters of the country, and that even without the constitutional amendment the people consider the popular will should prevail.

So if there is any one thing settled in this country it is the question that Senators shall hereafter be elected by the people. The people so understand the seventeenth amendment. It would be a great surprise and sad disappointment to them after the amendment has been ratified by the necessary number of States of the Union, and proclaimed to be the law of the land, that now through some technicality it is not in full operation in some of the States.

For my part, I believe that the amendment means exactly what it says. It is perfectly plain and unambiguous. It simply means from this time forward every Senator of the United States must be elected by the people, unless the legislature of a State by express terms empowers the executive to make temporary appointments to fill vacancies.

The Legislature of the State of Alabama has not given such power to the executive. The statutes of Alabama do, however, give ample authority for calling an election. The amendment provides that:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such States shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Article 19 of chapter 15 of the Code of Alabama, 1907, treats of the subject of special elections, and the fifth subdivision of section 430 expressly provides for the present contingency. After providing for the filling of vacancies for various offices expressly named, it then makes the broad general provision as follows:

5. In such other cases as are or may be provided for by law.

From the reading of section 332 of the Alabama Code it would seem that this State is one of those which must have anticipated the necessity for conducting an election by the people for

United States Senator. It provides as follows:

General election; for whom held; General elections throughout the State shall be held for governor; lieutenant governor; attorney general; State shall be held for governor; lieutenant governor; attorney general; State auditor; secretary of state; State treasurer; superintendent of education; commissioner of agriculture and industries; three railroad commissioners, no two of whom shall be elected from the same congressional district; State game and fish commissioner; chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court; supernumerary judge; and electors for President and Vice President of the United States; and such other officers as may be required by law to be elected by the voters of the entire State.

A reference to chapter 15 of the Code of Alabama will demonstrate to anyone that all of the necessary machinery for the conducting of an election to fill a vacancy in the Senate is fully provided for by the Alabama statutes.

Complaint is made that the great State of Alabama is being denied equal representation in this body and that we are there-fore violating another provision in the Constitution by reason thereof. If this is true, no one is to blame except the gov-ernor of Alabama. The Congress of the United States has provided a way in this very amendment for the filling of the vacancies by an election, and the people of the State of Alabama have provided a way for the election to be held under their laws. It is simply up to the governor of Alabama to call an election under the plain provisions of the seventeenth amendment and the statutes of the State of Alabama. Had he done so when the vacancy occurred, Alabama would have had her equal representation with the other States long ago. Or had he called the legislature together and secured the necessary authority from the legislature under the plain and express provisions of the amendment, the place could have been filled by appointment long ago.

The governor of Maryland, with no greater authority, called an election, and Senator Lee, with his commission from the people, was duly and rightfully seated. When the governor of Alabama takes a similar course there will be no question of the seating of a Senator coming here from that State with credentials from the people. To take any different action now would be inconsistent with our action already taken in the Lee case, and a direct violation of the express terms of the Constitution of the United States. All the governor of Alabama has to do is to follow the plain letter of the Constitution.

The argument advanced that the seventeenth amendment is not in effect until the States take some affirmative action is untenable. If this were true it would lie within the power of any State, if congressional action failed, to absolutely defeat a sacred and binding constitutional amendment. I do not believe received practically the unanimous election by the legislature, the people of the country are ready to accept any such doctrine regardless of politics. Not a single man who advocated that the and constructions offered on the part of those desiring to seat Mr. Glass would result in the greatest confusion, and might cause serious trouble in many of the States which are to elect Senators to fill one-third of the seats in this body this year. It would leave the matter of filling vacancies an open question for many years. To let the country know now that none need apply for admission to the Senate except those with credentials from the people will save any further difficulty, and every State will clearly understand what it must do in order to secure representation in this body pursuant to the amendment of the Constitution which has already become effective alike in all the States. It is for the States to conform to the requirements of the constitutional amendment now, just the same as they were required to conform to the Constitution when it was originally written.

The amendment simply changes the manner of electing Senators from the legislatures to the people of the States, and I feel certain that the election laws of every State in the Union are sufficiently broad, or can easily be made sufficient, to enable the people of every State to conform to this amendment. The purpose of the amendment is to compel the election of Senators by the people. This being the express wording of the amendment and the clear intention of the people when they adopted the amendment, I can not conscientiously vote to seat Mr. Glass, as much as I would like to increase the Democratic majority in the Senate. I shall vote to sustain the action of the committee, which I believe to be the correct view of the law, and above all else to be absolutely right and what the people of Alabama desire and what the Constitution of the United States demands.

During the delivery of Mr. Thompson's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SIMMONS. I observe that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who has charge of the bill, is absent from the Chamber. I am sure that if he were present he would ask to lay it temporarily aside, and I myself take the liberty of making that request. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. Thompson's speech,

Mr. BRADLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, something has been said about the inconsistency of those who may have voted for the seating of Senator Lee in now voting for the admission of Mr. Glass. From the standpoint of those Senators who voted for Senator Lee I do not think there is any inconsistency. If they had voted for Senator Lee in utter disregard of the provisions of the seventeenth amendment and the old Constitution, there might have been such inconsistency, but there were many Senators who voted for the admission of Senator Lee who are in favor of the admission of Senator Lee who are in favor of the admission of Senator Glass, as I understand, because there was a statute in Maryland which they believed authorized the election; because an election had been ordered under that statute by the governor on the advice of the attorney general; because the Supreme Court of the State of Maryland had construed that statute as in effect authorizing the calling of the election by the governor; because the people of the State had voted by a large majority for the election of Senator IAE; because that election was held on regular election day submitted to by all parties without objection; because no contest had been filed; and because there was no fraud claimed. Hence it was believed by them that it was their duty to give respect to the construction which had been adopted by the State officers, the court, and the people of Maryland, rather than to give a construction strictly under the Constitution and the amendment.

In other words, they adopted the rule of the Federal courts that they are bound by the decision of the court of last resort concerning the construction of the constitution of the statutes or constitution of the State. I differ with them, believing that the Senate is the sole judge of the election and qualifications of its Members, and that we should decide the case as the sole judges under the Constitution of the United States and the amendment. But whether they were right or I am right, the two cases rest upon a different foundation. In the Alabama case no election was called or held; in that case the Supreme Court of Alabama did not pass upon the amendment to the Constitution or the right to call an election. In these respects the two cases are entirely different. But in other respects the two cases are similar. The governor of Alabama, under the advice of the attorney general, made the Therefore we have the ruling of the constituted authority of Alabama, and no human being has ever appeared here from that State to object, much less to contest, the right of Mr. Glass to his seat. If we are to give effect to the acts of the law officers and people of the State of Maryland, why not give effect to the acts of law officers and the silent approval of the people of the State of Alabama?

The statute which underlies this case, and which is relied upon as establishing the right of the governor to call an election, is entirely different from the statute of Maryland. It is admitted that the statute of Alabama authorizing special elections does not specifically name a United States Senator, but it is contended with very great seriousness that the basket clause of that statute, which provides that elections may be held "in such other cases as are or may be provided by law," authorizes an election because the amendment requires that the governor shall issue a writ of election, and that the amendment, taken in connection with the statute, confers ample authority. I call your attention to the fact that the article governing all elections contained in the code of Alabama is specifically described in its caption—and that caption is as much a part of the statute as any section of the statute is a part of it—as governing "elections of State and county officers who are elected by the people," "State and county officers who are elected by the people," is the subject matter of the entire statute. If a United States Senator is not a State officer, as contended by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] and those who follow his lead, it is impossible that he can be embraced in the statute. When that caption speaks of "such cases as are or may be provided by law," it has reference exclusively to the statute of Alabama governing the election of State and county officers. The words "such other cases" refers to the character of offices enumerated, to wit, State and county offices, and can not be construed to refer to any other. See Endlich on the Interpretation of States, 460.

But unfortunately for the contention of Senator Walsh, this statute on which he hinges the right to hold the election was repealed four years before the seventeenth amendment became part of the Constitution and was not in existence when the amendment became valid. The omnibus section was passed in 1875 and, as stated, applied only to the offices Lamed and others of like character.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRADLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am greatly interested in the argument of the Senator, but I should like to know whether he contends that a United States Senator is a State officer or a Federal officer? I ask the question because both the statute providing for special elections to which he has referred and the statute authorizing the governor to appoint to fill vacancies apply to State officers.

Mr. BRADLEY. My opinion is that a United States Senator is a State officer under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Burton's case, which holds that "while the Senate, as a branch of the legislative department, owes its existence to the Constitution and participates in passing laws that concern the entire country, its Members are chosen by State legislatures, and can not properly be said to hold their places under the Government of the United States."

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that I entirely agree with him. I merely thought his argument might seem rather involved unless that was made clear.

Mr. BRADLEY. I was simply proceeding upon the theory of the Senator from Montana, who contends that a Senator is not a State officer, and I say if he is not this statute can not be tortured into an application to him. If a Senator is a State officer, I propose to show that this statute has been repealed and therefore can not have any application. The statute was passed in 1875. In 1909, long before the constitutional amendment was adopted, the State of Alabama passed a law not only giving the governor the power but requiring him to appoint to fill any va-cancy in any case where the election was not provided by law. So the clause under this omnibus section, "in such other cases as are or may be provided by law," was repealed by the legislature, and the right to hold special elections "in such cases as are or may be provided by law" ceased to exist. The power was conferred on the governor to appoint in such cases four years before the seventeenth amendment went into effect. Hence the amendment could not come to the aid of a statute not in exist-

But it is argued that the authority under the law of 1909 to the governor to appoint for the residue of the term conflicts with both the old Constitution and the amendment, because in the first instance the governor can not appoint beyond the action of the next legislature, and in the last he can only appoint until the people elect, and the law is therefore unconstitutional. It is conceded that the governor can not legally appoint for the residue of the term, but this does not render the appointment nugatory. It only limits it to such time as is allowed by the Constitution, and is inoperative in so far as it extends beyond that time. The right to appoint is not interfered with, and only the time for which the appointment is to be made is affected. Such has uniformly been the decisions of the courts, so much so as to render citation of authority unnecessary. But if the seventeenth amendment came to the support of the omnibus clause, had it not been repealed, it is equally true that it comes to the support of the statute conferring the power of appointment on the governor, which has taken the place of the omnibus clause, because the seventeenth amendment provides that the governor may appoint when empowered by the legislature so to do. If the amendment could give effect to a statute authorizing an election, there can be no reason why it can not give effect to a statute authorizing an appointment. said that a United States Senator is a State officer, as held in Burton's case. Not only so, he is a State officer because he is elected by the legislature of the State or by the people of his State, as the case may be. He is not elected by the people of the United States. He comes here with a commission signed by the governor of his State, and that commission authorizes him to be admitted as a Senator. Without that commission he can not be admitted.

Nor is this all. If a Senator concludes to resign, he sends his resignation to the governor of his State, not to the Presiding Officer of the Senate or the President of the United States, because he derives all his power and all his authority from his State and holds his title under the State.

But I contend, Mr. President, as I contended the other day in the argument in the Lee case, that the seventeenth amendment has no sort of control over the election of Senators or any part of their term who were chosen prior to its becoming valid part of the Constitution.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRADLEY. With pleasure.

Before the Senator goes into a discourse of Mr. SIMMONS. the second branch of his subject, I wish to ask him a question about the first branch. I am very much more interested in the first than I am in the second, because I think I am more nearly agreeing with the Senator as to his position in the first part of his argument than I am likely to agree with him as to the part of his argument.

The Senator says that the act of 1909 repeals the act of 1875 which provided for special elections. I understand that the Senator from Montana disputes that proposition, He contends that the latter act does not repeal the former act, and that there is not necessarily any conflict between them. As I understand the Senator from Montana, and it is about that I want the suggestion of the Senator, his contention is that the act of 1909 authorizing the governor to fill vacancies has no application whatever to a case covered by the act of 1875. But if the act of 1875 does not cover a particular case, does not provide a method for filling a vacancy in a particular office, then, under the authority of the act of 1909, the governor may fill the vacancy. The Senator contends that the act of 1875 does provide for an election to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate, and as it provides a method for filling a vacancy in the United States Senate, therefore the act of 1909 can have no application, because by its express terms it limits the power of the governor to appoint to fill a vacancy where there is no other legal method of filling that office. I am not saying that I agree with that contention; but I am simply inviting the Senator to discuss that phase of the subject.

Mr. BRADLEY. So far as the difference in contention is concerned between the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] and myself, it will probably never be settled by our agreement. The reason I make the contention is this: Here is an act providing for special elections in the State of Alabama. It mentions various offices, but it does not mention that of United States Senator. In its basket clause it provides for elections in such other cases as are or may be provided for by law." The Senator from Montana says that a United States Senator is not a State officer. If he is not, that seems to me to be the end of it; and if he is, it is the end of it, because the basket clause is repealed by the act which confers the power of appointment on the governor in such cases. Hence, this section of the law can not be taken in connection with the seventeenth amendment and the two together construed to confer the power on the governor to call the election. The statute in regard to special elections names elections for all of the offices that occurred to the legislature making the statute-all the offices as to which special elections were to be held. It did not name United States Senators, but added "in such other cases as are or may be provided for by law." While special elections were originally allowed in cases of that description, the right of election was destroyed by the act of 1909. In that year the State of Alabama adopted this law:

That when any office of the State, of any county or municipality

And those were all State offices that were alluded to in that statute, and they are so headed in the beginning of the statuteis vacant, from death, resignation, removal from the municipality, county, or State, or because the former incumbent absconds, or because an incumbent has been removed for ineligibility, or when the office is vacant from any other cause, and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office—

The very language of this act of 1875-the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

The position I take is that before that law passed, in regard to cases where the office has not been named, special elections might be held if the officers were to be elected by the people, but in 1909 the right to call special elections in that law was superseded by making it the duty of the governor to appoint in such cases. The old basket clause is a dead letter, and there is no authority now to hold any special election either in conjunction with the seventeenth amendment or otherwise; but all uch vacancies must be filled by the governor.

Mr. President, I dislike to repeat what I may have heretofore said in the argument of the Lee case, but possibly it is necessary, as there are some Senators present to-day who were not present then. I contend that the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, so far as vacancies are concerned, has reference entirely to vacancies in the office of Senators chosen by the people. That amendment has been read a great number of times during the argument of this case. It seems, in the language of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Williams], that it is so perfectly plain without any argument that its provisions need no elucidation. It is said the people expected an election in all cases where vacancies should occur. If this be true, why did they not say so in the seventeenth amendment? Why did not the framers of the seventeenth amendment and those who voted to ratify it say so?

We can only consider the amendment through which the people have spoken, and which was proposed and ratified at their instance upon its face, to determine what it means. All the discussion that took place before and after it was framed in this Senate and up to the time of its ratification had reference entirely to the election of United States Senators in the future, No human being ever contended that the amendment should in any way affect the terms of Senators who had been elected prior to its becoming valid. Nothing of that sort was heard in the United States. The only proposition discussed was that in the future in the regular election of Senators they should be elected by the people. The amendment first provides that each State is entitled to two Senators, to be elected by the people, referring, of course, to regular election of Senators, because they are required to be elected for six years. The amendment then proceeds:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate

And so forth.

What vacancies are referred to? Evidently vacancies in the offices mentioned in the preceding part of the amendment. You can not destroy the continuity of purpose and the continuity of meaning between those two parts of the amendment. It evidently refers to vacancies which may occur in the office of Senators who are elected by the people. Continuing, the amendment provides:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies until—

And so forth.

Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

The amendment is not self-executing. The governor can not appoint unless empowered to do so by legislative enactment; he can issue a writ of election only "provided" the election is directed by the legislature.

As to whether the amendment was wisely constructed amounts to nothing in this discussion. We can only deal with it as we find it. If not wisely constructed, Alabama is not responsible, because it did not ratify it, no session of its legislature having met after its proposal. Alabama was the first State to declare in favor of the election of Senators by the people, and doubtless would have ratified it if its legislature had convened.

Evidently it was not the purpose of the framers of this amendment to create a clash between the old Constitution and the amendment, but was clearly their intention to allow vacancies in the office of Senators who were elected under the old Constitution to be supplied under the provisions of that instrument and to provide that vacancies in places of Senators elected under the amendment should be filled in an entirely different manner. They determined that the Congress should not fill a vacancy either temporarily or by election.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Is it not the correct construction that it provided both means; that is, the executive could call an election, but the legislature could authorize the executive to fill the vacancy by appointment until the election?

Mr. BRADLEY. There is no doubt about that construction of the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I thought, but that is not what I inferred from the Senator's argument.

Mr. BRADLEY. While the executive could issue a writ of election or temporarily fill a vacancy, his right to do so depended entirely on legislation.

If there were any doubt that the vacancies referred to in the amendment have no application to vacancies occurring in the terms of Senators elected before the amendment became valid, it is easily dispelled by the saving clause, which provides:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

Here is a plain and positive declaration that can not be misconstrued if any meaning attaches to language. The object of the framers was to harmonize the amendment with the old Constitution. Under the new amendment the people elect the Senator; under that amendment the people supply a vacancy in his office by like election. Under the old Constitution the legislature elects the Senator, and under that Constitution the legislature, in case of vacancy, elects his successor. both systems the governor may appoint temporarily. These two methods were intended to operate, each in its particular sphere, independently of the other, so that there would be no clash or confusion which might result in a hiatus in the representation

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's contention is correct, I should like to ask him whether the Senate was not in error when, for instance, it admitted the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon], who I understand-

That case does not touch this case at all. Mr. BRADLEY. That case does not touch this case at all. Mr. NORRIS. My understanding is that the Senator's contention is that a term that had commenced before the amendment was adopted is one as to which the amendment will not have any application until the expiration of the six years?

Mr. BRADLEY. That is correct as to an election for a term. Mr. NORRIS. Well, the term of the Senator from Georgia. as I understand, expired on the 4th of March. He was then appointed by the governor to fill the vacancy. The legislature, I think, met some time in June. In the meantime the seventeenth amendment, on the 31st day of May, became effective. If the Senator's contention is right, when that legislature met, instead of providing by law for an election at which the Senator from Georgia might be elected, they ought themselves to have elected a Senator.

Mr. BRADLEY. I do not remember anything about the facts in that case, but I do remember that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] came upon this floor, as I have since heard, without any right in the world, if anybody had contested it, to a seat, but nobody contested it, and he was admitted by unanimous consent. No ques ion was raised; there was no controversy about it. Indeed, the Senate did not know the conditions existing. The action in his case has no application in the world to this. The Senator from Georgia was finally elected by the people, after his full original term had expired, and he holds here to-day under the commission of the people by virtue of the amendment.

Answering your question, if the Senator's regular term to which he was elected prior to the amendment becoming valid had expired, the governor had no right to appoint, and his place could have been legally filled only by an election, because only the election or term of a Senator chosen before the amendment became valid as part of the Constitution is protected.

Mr. NORRIS. But the term for which the people elected him was the filling out of a term that had commenced to run before the seventeenth amendment became effective.

Mr. BRADLEY. I do not so understand it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is no dispute about that.

Mr. BRADLEY. Whether that be true or not, it has no influence on this case, because in that case there was never any question raised; there was never any adjudication by the Senate. It was passed over without notice on the part of anybody.

If the Senate made a mistake in that case simply because its attention was not called to the facts, it can not have any influ-

If the framers had only intended that a Senator should be protected who was elected, they would have said that the adoption of the seventeenth amendment should not interfere with the election of any Senator; but they added the words "or term' after the word "election."

Why use the word "term"? Why use any word except the word "election"? Or if they did not intend to protect the entire period of six years, why did they not use the word "tenure" instead of the word "term"? A "term" is a whole period; it is a unit; it is not susceptible of partition. Parts of a term may be served out by different men, but the whole time is a "term" nevertheless. It is the filling of the term of Senator Johnston that we are to-day discussing.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me right there-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.
Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is not that suggestion reenforced by the fact that the Senate itself is divided into three classes of terms? The terms of Senators here are divided into three classes—the first, second, and third classes. The idea strikes me that those are the terms to which the States are entitled under the provision that no State shall ever be unrepresented on this

Mr. BRADLEY. I was coming to that. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. At the bottom of this whole amendment lies the foundation of the basis of senatorial representation as protected by the fifth article of the Constitution. When our fore-fathers met for the purpose of framing a constitution there was great bitterness and much discussion as to the basis of representation to be given the States. It was contended that a small State, like Rhode Island, should not have two Senators when a great State, like New York, had only two, and that senatorial representation should be in proportion to population. The trouble then was to induce the States to agree on a constitution. That debate continued for some time, until finally it was decided that each State should have the same representation; and, even then, before the small States would vote for the Constitution they demanded that there should be placed in it a provision that no State should ever be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent. Accordingly that provision was placed in the Constitution, and to-day it is the only part of the Constitution that is not subject to change or amendment. That provision does not mean that no State shall be permanently, deprived of equal representation, but that it shall not be so de-

Of course, when we undertook to frame the seventeenth amendment we necessarily took into consideration the basic principle of senatorial representation, that no State should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent. If the construction is to be given the amendment which is contended for by the Senator from Montana, then States may be deprived of their representation in the Senate for a considerable length of time; and if this be true, the amendment is itself unconstitutional. Why may they be deprived?

Since August the great State of Alabama has had only one Senator. In the intervening time we have had before this body more important legislation than we ever had in any corresponding period of time in the past, and yet Alabama has had but one vote, or has had but one-half a voice. the purpose of the framers of the seventeenth amendment that such a state of case as that should exist. It was their purpose to protect the Senators chosen under the provisions of the old Constitution and their terms, and to prevent any hiatus. the new Senators came in, there was provided a specific way for filling their vacancies, but it was never intended that the Congress of the United States should control as to the filling of a vacancy in the term of a Senator who was elected by the people. Why? Because the amendment not only omits the authority in the old Constitution given to Congress, the right to act the same as the States in fixing the time and manner of holding senatorial elections, but provides specifically that the old rule, which gave the governor the right to appoint, shall no longer exist as to the newly elected Senators; that the old rule which gave the legislature the right to elect shall not exist any longer, so far as the new Senators are concerned. They having been elected by the people, the State, in the first place, through its legislature, can authorize the governor to appoint until the people hold an election, and that election must be held as directed by the legislature of the State, not as directed by the Congress of the United States.

The Congress can not say how a vacancy in the term of a Senator elected by the people can be filled by appointment; neither can Congress say how it can be filled by election, for that right has been reserved to each of the States. A specific agency having been selected excludes every other agency.

The language of the amendment is plain; it is so clearly expressed that there should be no controversy about it, and there is really no necessity for resorting to legal rules in order to construe the amendment, because there is nothing in it that requires the employment of legal rules. It is perfectly plain in every word that is written, so plain that the layman can understand it as well as the lawyer. The surrounding circumstances fully justified the action of the framers. Every Senator on this floor knew when the amendment was proposed that the people should have the right to elect Senators that this proposal would be discussed for some time, and there was such a discussion extending, as I remember, through two sessions before the proposal was enacted. They knew not only that much time would be consumed in obtaining a twothirds majority for the proposal of the amendment, but that when the amendment was proposed to the States as the State legislatures met annually, biennially, triennially, or quadrennially, that it would necessarily take a very considerable time to enable three-fourths of the States to pass upon the ratification or nonratification of the proposed amendment, and even then it was not absolutely certain that it would be ratified. They knew, too, that after the States ratified it it would require considerable time to put it in force; and, consequently, they provided in the amendment such protection as would prevent any hiatus, any vacancy; such protection as would prevent any clash under the Constitution as to the old and the new Senators. Are we to presume that it was their intention that elections were to be held immediately upon its ratification? Here again the fact presented itself of annual, biennial, triennial, and quadrennial sessions. Consequently, while the legislatures were acting, reasonably presuming that vacancies would occur in the places of the old Senators, it can not be supposed for a moment that they intended any State should be only partially represented. The 48 governors of the States fortify this construction, or they would have called special sessions of the legislatures to enforce the amendment. Not a single governor has taken this

But we are told that the reason that the saving clause was incorporated was to prevent the construction that the old Senators were legislated out of office. Such a construction would lead to a total extinction of the Senate, and no sane man would indulge it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. For the purpose of clarifying the argument the Senator is making, I desire to inquire, if I may, if he takes the view expressed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], that former Senator Johnston's term is still subsisting?

Mr. BRADLEY. I do.

Mr. WALSH. And likewise that former Senator Rayner's term is still subsisting?

Mr. BRADLEY. I do.

Mr. WALSH. And likewise that the term of former Senator Hughes, of Colorado, is still subsisting?

Mr. BRADLEY. I do.

Mr. WALSH. And, of course, that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Thomas] has no term?

Mr. BRADLEY. That is right. He is simply serving out the term of Mr. Hughes.

Mr. WALSH. Very good. Now, the last clause of the seventeenth amendment protects the election and term of Senators. Senator Jackson was not elected, and he had no term. Is it the view of the Senator that the last clause gave no protection whatever to Senator Jackson?

Mr. BRADLEY. I have expressed myself heretofore on that question, Mr. President, and I will express myself again. These gentlemen are entitled to the protection which their predecessors had during their terms. They stepped into their shoes. Not only so, sir, but the last clause of the amendment, after saying that it shall not interfere with the election or term of any Senator, uses the word "chosen"—"shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen." Why use the word "chosen?" One who is elected and one who is appointed do not occupy the same position; in other words, one who is appointed is not elected. Therefore the word "chosen" was used, which embraced not only the appointment but also the election. But, as I have said, that is immaterial, because the Senators who stepped into the shoes of Senators elected under the old Constitution are protected under the Constitution, even if the word "chosen" had not been used.

It was the purpose to protect the States against any interregnum in their representation; it was the purpose to make a new rule which was to apply to the cases embraced in that rule, but not to apply it in the cases embraced in the old rule. If not, what was the meaning of the saving clause? Why was a saving clause necessary? Why not leave it just as it stood, if that was the purpose? Everybody knew that it was not the purpose of the framers of the amendment to put the United States Senate out of existence, even if the seventeenth amendment had been adopted without the saving clause; everybody knew that the amendment would not have a retrospective effect, but that all constitutions and statutes are to be construed prospectively, unless it is impossible to so construe them from their plain wording.

The word "affect," as defined by lexicographers, synonomists,

The word "affect," as defined by lexicographers, synonomists, and the courts, has been held to mean, as used in the amendment, that the election or term of a Senator chosen before the amendment became valid as part of the Constitution "should not be acted upon, effected, concerned, enlarged, changed, prejudiced, or injuriously affected, impaired, worked upon, varied, aimed at, influenced, or operated upon."

Having specifically enumerated these authorities in my discussion in the Lee case, time will not now be consumed by repeating them.

If we are to go into the realm of liberality, as was done in the case of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Lee], if we are to respect the State authorities in Maryland upon the theory that the United States Supreme Court has ruled that the decision of a State court construing a State statute shall control, why not be equally liberal with the State of Alabama? Her officers have construed the State statute; her officers have construed this amendment; her governor has appointed; he has appointed under the advice of his attorney general, just as the governor of Maryland held his election under the advice of his attorney general.

Let us be equally fair with both States. If we are going to act in a liberal spirit in order to respect the State authorities, let us give to Alabama the same consideration that was given to Maryland.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in what I have to say on this question before the Senate.

The wisest man I ever knew, and one of the best lawyers Alabama has ever produced, was former Senator Pettus, who died while filling a term from the State of Alabama, and Senator Johnston was chosen as his successor. Senator Pettus was very fond of young men, especially young lawyers. It was universely sally known everywhere in Alabama that a young, struggling lawyer could go to Senator Pettus and get perhaps better advice than he could from any other source in the State. When a young man approached him for advice he invariably said, "Young man, when you are in doubt make a bee line for justice, common sense, and reason, and nine times in ten you will be right."

Mr. President, I am not a lawyer. I wish I were; but if I were regarded in my State as one of the ablest lawyers in that Commonwealth I should be perhaps in no better condition to judge of this question than I am now, because the ablest lawyers in this body and the ablest lawyers in the State of Alabama can not construct this amendment.

The Congress of the United States for years discussed this amendment. They were endeavoring to frame an amendment to the Constitution that would meet as nearly as possible the public demand of the country that Senators be elected by a popular vote of the people. At last they submitted the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, and in due course of time a sufficient number of the States ratified the amendment and it became a part of the Constitution.

I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who would have voted to submit the seventeenth amendment to the States for ratification if he had believed that when it was ratified and became a part of the fundamental law, if a vacancy occurred in the Senate, before that vacancy could be filled the legislature of the State must be called in extraordinary session, at great expense and inconvenience, and must authorize the governor of the State to make a temporary appointment until a Senator could be elected under the laws made and provided for that purpose. Moreover, I do not believe there is a single State in the Union whose legislature would have ratified the amendment if its people had been told and had believed that when ratified and when it had become a part of the Constitution it would be necessary for their State to have their legislature convened in extraordinary session for the purpose of providing some means by which the amendment could be put into operation.

It must be borne in mind that when this amendment was sub-

It must be borne in mind that when this amendment was submitted to the people for ratification there was not a State in the Union that had provided any laws for the election of a Senator by the people. It must have been known to the Senate that the legislatures of the different States in this Union met annually, biennially, triennially, and quadrennially. None of them had prepared for it. Does anybody suppose that when this amendment was submitted the Congress of the United States intended that an election should be held on the 1st day of June, the next day after its adoption, if a vacancy should occur? Impossible! Impossible, Mr. President!

What is the common sense of this matter? What was the purpose of the Congress when it submitted the amendment to the States for ratification? That Senators should be elected by a vote of the people? Yes. When? When was the election to be held? As soon as the States could provide for an election, or as soon as the Congress of the United States, by an act of Congress, put the amendment into effect generally. It could not have been considered for a moment that when the amendment was submitted the Congress of the United States contemplated any other course.

Mr. President, the funeral train that bore Senator Johnston's body to Alabama had a fearful wreck on the way, and Senators who were on that train told me that it was God's mercy that they were not all killed in the wreck. Suppose God's mercy had not protected them; what would have happened, and what would have been the situation in the Senate?

There were four Democratic Senators on that train. Suppose—and it is not impossible that it might have happened; wrecks occur and kill a great many people; collisions at sea kill a great many people, and other accidents occur that destroy lives—suppose those four Democratic Senators had been killed in the wreck; what would have happened, and what would have been the condition in the Senate? The majority in the Senate would have been instantly transferred to the other side of the aisle; the Democratic Party would have lost control of the Senate; the people of this country would have been denied by an accident of that sort the privileges and benefits of the great victory they won in the election of 1912, and no remedy would have been in sight.

What would the Senate have done under those circumstances? There would have been no way of filling the vacancies for months and months. There was no State then prepared for an election. What would have been the situation in the Senate? As I have said, the Democratic majority, chosen by the people in the preceding election, chosen for a purpose, chosen with the view that certain great Democratic principles and policies might be written into the statute books, would have absolutely disappeared, and no remedy would have been in sight. Having had the majority transferred to the other side, our friends on that side would have had absolute control of the Senate. We could not have adjourned from day to day or taken a recess from day to day waiting for others to come and take the places of those who had lost their lives in that wreck in order to restore our majority in the Senate.

Does anybody believe the Congress of the United States contemplated anything like that in the adoption of this amendment?

It is inconceivable, Mr. President.

I am not going to discuss in this presence the effect of the seventeenth amendment. It has been elaborately discussed by the great lawyers on both sides of the question, and they have been unable to agree; and of course I could not shed any light on a subject about which eminent lawyers are unable to agree. There is, however, a phase of the question that I desire to present to the Senate. I do not question the power of the governor to make this appointment under the terms and provisions of the seventeenth amendment, but for the purposes of this argument I am going to dismiss that and direct my remarks to the authority given the governor of Alabama under the statutes of Alabama to make an appointment to fill this vacancy.

There is no necessary conflict between the Alabama case and the Maryland case. I voted to seat the Senator from Maryland. There is no necessary conflict between the two. In Maryland the attorney general and the legal advisers of the governor told him that he had the authority to order an election to fill the vacancy, and he ordered the election. It was held; nobody questioned its honesty, and the Senator has been seated. The statutes in Alabama are broader. They have been enacted more recently than the Maryland statute. They not only give the governor authority to appoint but they require him to appoint to fill a vacancy in any State office.

to fill a vacancy in any State office.

The distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] this morning unhesitatingly declared that in his belief a United States Senator was not a State officer, but he did not tell us what kind of an officer he was. He is not an Army officer; he is not a naval officer; he is not a judicial officer. He is an officer of the State of Alabama, appointed under the laws of Alabama. If he resigns his place in the Senate, he sends his resignation, not to the President of the Senate but to the governor of Alabama. Our courts have held that he is a State officer, and our legal authorities have held that under the statutes authorizing the governor to appoint persons to fill all vacancies the governor had ample authority to appoint Mr. Glass to fill this vacancy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator know of any case in our law where a State official, governor or otherwise, is permitted to appoint any except a State officer, or an officer of a county of a State?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not. I do not think anybody would

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not. I do not think anybody would assert that. I do not think anybody would say that under any construction of this statute the governor could appoint an Army officer and commission him for service in the Army, or an officer of the Navy, or an officer to engage in any other service than that of the State of Alabama.

I have just said that the distinguished Senator from Montana this morning unhesitatingly asserted that a United States Senator was not a State officer, but he did not tell what kind of an officer he was. The Constitution of the United States decides that question. We do not have to go to the Burton case; we do not have to go to the decision of any of the courts; but the Constitution of our country in express terms declares that a Senator can not be an officer of the United States of any sort.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair).
Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the question which was asked of the Senator from Alabama by the Senator from North Carolina, permit me to ask a question. Does the Senator know of any other State official who receives his pay from the Federal Government and whose sole power and authority is exercised under the Federal Constitution and the statutes which are passed in pursuance thereof? The United States Senate, one of the Houses of the American Congress, is the judge of his election and his qualifications, and alone can remove him from office. Those being the facts, would it not be better to describe him as a Federal officer, owing his credentials simply to the State?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, while it is true that the Senate is the judge of the election and qualifications of its Members, if it expels a Member for any cause it can not appoint one in his place. That must be done by the State in some form or other. Do I understand that the Senator from Ohio contends that a State senator is not a State officer under the proper construction of the decisions of the courts and the provisions of the Constitution itself?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I expressed no opinion at all as to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought the Senator did.

Mr. President, I said that under the circumstances, the other phase of this question having been so elaborately discussed, I preferred to confine myself mainly to the authority of the governor to appoint under the statutes of Alabama. I know it has been said: "Yes; the governor may have the power to appoint, but he has exceeded his authority in attempting to appoint for the mexpired term. Therefore your statute is in conflict with the seventeenth amendment, and therefore the action of the governor in making the appointment is illegal."

If there is a conflict between the statute of Alabama and the Federal Constitution, it does not concern the power of the governor to appoint. Nobody questions that. Our courts and the legal advisers to the State administration have declared Senators to be State officers. The governor, acting upon that advice, made this appointment under the statute not only authorizing him but requiring him to fill the vacancy.

Suppose there is a conflict between the statute and the constitutional amendment as to the filling of the vacancy; what happens, and what must necessarily happen? The appointment by the governor holds good until the point is reached where the statute comes in conflict with the seventeenth amendment. does not conflict in the matter of appointment. If there is a conflict, it is necessarily in the statute authorizing the governor to fill the vacancy for the unexpired term.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an inter-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. To strengthen the suggestion, suppose that after the constitutional amendment had been adopted the Legislature of Alabama not previously authorizing, but subsequently authorizing, the governor in the very language of the amendment to make temporary appointments until the people filled the vacancy by election, the governor, exceeding that authority, had undertaken to make an appointment for a longer term. Would anyone contend for a moment that it would not have been valid within the authority of the amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think not.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator allow a question?

low a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

St. ARK of Wyoming. I should be glad if the Senator Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should be glad if the Senator would give his views as to whether the power of the governor to appoint in any case is or is not derived directly from the Constitution of the United States—the part which refers to the election of Senators and the apportionment of Senators?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think perhaps there is no question about the power being originally granted there.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I will ask the Senator whether there can be two provisions, one from the State and one from the other, which are concurrent? Does not the authority flow either from the Constitution of the United States or from the State itself?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In a certain sense, yes; but there is, no necessary conflict that I can see in this case in that respect.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President— The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Ohio? Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the fact that the Federal Constitution gave to the governor the authority to appoint a Senator to hold the office until the legislature should again convene, it was for that reason not necessary that the Legislature of Alabama should have such appointments in mind at the time it passed the statute to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in answer to that, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if this statute, passed before the adoption of this constitutional amendment, is not just as legal a statute from his standpoint as the statute of Maryland, which authorized an election?

Mr. POMERENE. I assume that they were both legal; but my position is that the Alabama statute is not broad enough to authorize the appointment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I do not know; it says so in so many words in the statute.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to have my attention called to that particular language, if it be true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the statute say that the governor is authorized and required to fill all vacancies that may occur? Mr. POMERENE. Not all vacancies. I have the language here, and I will read it:

That when any office of the State, of any county, or municipality thereof, is vacant from death, resignation, removal from the municipality, county, or State, or because the former incumbent absconds, or because an incumbent has been removed for ineligibility, or when the office is vacant from any other cause, and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office, the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Exactly. Mr. POMERENE. It is not contended, and it can not be contended, that if a law was passed especially for that purpose by the Alabama Legislature the governor would have the authority to appoint a Senator for the "unexpired term," because the Federal Constitution only authorizes appointments by the governor until the legislature convenes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am coming to that, Mr. President. Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was saying that if there was a conflict at all it was not as to the question of appointment, but it was as to the question of the governor's power to appoint to fill the unexpired term.

Mr. President, suppose there is a conflict between the statute and the amendment with respect to the filling of an unexpired term, what necessarily happens? The very moment the statute under which the governor acts reaches the point where it comes in conflict with the Constitution the statute must necessarily give way to the provision of the Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States is supreme in all the States of the Union, as I understand it, and being appointed as he is for the unexpired term, when an election is held to elect Senator under the provisions of the amendment and that Senator is elected and comes here with the certificate of the governor of the State of Alabama, the term of the Senator sitting from Alabama, Mr. Glass in this case, would expire and the new man would at once take his seat in the Senate. is no question about that, I think, and therefore I say there is no necessary conflict in that respect.

I was pleased the other day to hear the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin say that he thought the rule of construction should be that where the legal authorities of a State, the attorney general and their courts, had construed a statute or a provision of their constitution the Senate could not go wrong if they observed those decisions by the legal authorities of the State, the attorney general and the supreme court. They have construed these statutes, and I was again surprised at the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh]-and I should like to have his

Mr. WALSH. I am following the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. When he declared on the floor of the Senate that he had searched the constitution and statutes of Alabama and was unable to find any requirement or provision which required that vacancies in the legislature should be filled before an extra session could be convened. The constitution is plain. The statute made in pursuance of that constitutional provision is plain. I have it here before me. This is another instance of assuming, of guessing at what statutes are or ought to be in a State of the Union.

My contention that there is no necessary conflict between the statute of Alabama authorizing the governor to appoint and the seventeenth amendment is borne out by decisions of the court on cases directly in point. I beg to call the attention of the Senate to the decision of the Supreme Court of Nebraska in a case directly in point with the contention I am making with reference to the constitutional amendment and the statute of Alabama. The decision says:

The legislature has clearly here expressed its will-

The Alabama Legislature clearly expressed its will in this statute. It was that the governor was authorized and required to fill vacancies.

It has in an unmistakable manner signified its purpose not only to authorize the commitment to the reform school of certain children under 16 years of age, but also children beyond that age, who, although guiltless of crime, have evinced a criminal tendency and are without proper parental restraint. The legislature having declared its will, and its command to the court being in part valid and in part void—

Mark the language of the court: "Valid in part and in part

The decisive question is, Shall section 5 he given effect so far as it is in accord and agreement with the paramount law?

Shall the statute of Alabama be given full force and effect so far as it is in accord with the provisions of the Constitution which permits and directs the governor to appoint?

It seems that both good sense and judicial authority require that the question should receive an affirmative answer.

That is, the less is included in the greater. That is practically the gist of the decision.

Here is another decision in One hundred and fourth Kentucky, page 260. I will read only a few words from the decision:

The language employed shows that the general assembly was willing that one of the commissioners should hold his office for six years—two years longer than the constitution will permit.

This is a question where the statute of Kentucky undertook to extend the term of certain officers beyond the point provided in the constitution. It is exactly a parallel case with this:

As the general assembly expressed a willingness that one of the commissioners should hold for two years longer than the constitution permits, it is certainly reasonable to conclude that it was the will of that body that the commissioners should hold for four years, as this term is necessarily included in the longer one which is fixed. To hold the act void in so far as it makes the term six years instead of four, still the balance of the act is complete and enforceable.

That is to say, up to the point where the statute comes in conflict with the constitutional provision it was enforceable, and the court enforced it. When the act of the legislature undertook to go beyond the limit prescribed in the constitution the court held, and held properly, that it was void.

The purpose and intent of the general assembly that the commissioners should manage and control the penitentiaries can be effectuated by eliminating from the act that part which attempted to make terms six instead of four years.

Mr. President, if Mr. Glass is seated by the Senate, as soon as an election is held in Alabama as contemplated by the seventeenth amendment the person elected at that election will be entitled to come to Washington and take his seat in the Senate and Mr. Glass necessarily goes out of the Senate.

Take an election case in the House of Representatives. What happens there? A man comes to the House with a prima facie He has the certificate of the governor that he has been elected, and he is at once seated. No question is ever raised about seating him. If anyone wants to contest that election, if persons want to charge fraud, or if they claim that the election was illegal in any respect, they have their remedy; they can file a contest, and the House will hear it and pass upon its merits and its demerits, and either retain the sitting Member or seat the contestant.

That ought to be the rule in the Senate. Mr. President, I have no doubt on earth but that the framers of the Constitution intended that that should be the rule. When a man comes to the Senate with a certificate of the governor of his State, knocks at the door of the Senate and presents his credentials, with no one to contest his election or appointment, when the people of Alabama, so far as we know, are absolutely in favor of the Senate seating the representative they have sent here, as they have believed, in accordance with the provisions of the law, it is the duty of the Senate to seat him. I believe it has always been the practice in the Senate until recently that the appointee, or a man coming with a certificate of election, is entitled to his seat then and there.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield. Mr. WALSH. In view of the reference made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama to the practice and the precedents of the House, I ask his indulgence while I read from the first volume of Hinds' Precedents to show what is apparently the practice in the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have read it, but I will be glad to have the Senator read it to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I read from page 644:

On May 13, 1858, Mr. Henry M. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, announced the presence of Representatives from the recently admitted State of innesota, and moved that they be sworn in, at the same time presenting the following credentials.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I realize and recognize that there is one exception to the general rule in the House, and it is the only one. That is the one to which the Senator wishes to refer, I suppose.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator admits, I understand, that that was not the precedent followed in that case, and of course there is no use in reading it.

That is a very different case from the one Mr. BANKHEAD. Very different reasons were presented from those before us. given in this case.

Mr. WALSH. I am not controverting that question, but the Senator was referring to the precedent in the House. not followed in that case, and I think I can find another one.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I recalled the circumstances under which the contest against Mr. Roberts was presented. It was a sentimental question, and not one of law or reason or justice. It was a question of moral law. I presume every Senator here recalls that case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to say that I was a Member of the House at that time and that the case stood on no legal footing of any description. A few men who were accounted as being very wild reactionaries voted according to the law in the case. That case went off upon the principle of antagonism to polygamy in Utah. I do not suppose there was a Member of the House who ever quoted that case as legal authority. It was purely a sentimental charge, and has been from that day down to the present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was then a Member of the House, and I remember about it.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to be permitted to state that I was about to refer to the seating of Representatives from Minnesota, a State which, my information is, is free from polygamy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not remember that case, but I do remember very distinctly the Roberts case, in which the House of Representatives simply unseated Roberts because he was charged with polygamy. The House believed that he was guilty of it, and that was all there was to it.

BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have said about all I care to say. If I have satisfied the Senate that a Senator from Alabama is a State officer, then I think I have established my full contention. I believe I have established that fact beyond a reasonable doubt. I do not believe there is a Senator on the floor who will rise in his place and question that a United States Senator is an officer of the State. If that contention has been established, as I have established the further fact, according to my contention, supported by the opinion of the legal advisers of the governor of Alabama, by the decisions of courts, that there is no necessary conflict that can not be reconciled between the State authorizing the governor to appoint and the Constitution as it relates to the seventeenth amendment, then I should like to ask my brethren of the Senate what excuse will you offer the country and to Alabama for keeping the doors of the Senate closed against her representative who comes here with all the legal requirements as we see it and as our governor has been What excuse is there for saying that Alabama shall advised? not have her full and just representation in the United States Senate?

It will not do, sir, to say that the fault is Alabama's. It is not her fault, as we have shown conclusively, I think. Within three days after the death of the lamented Johnston the governor of Alabama exercised his constitutional power as he was advised, and sent a successor to the Senate to fill the place made vacant by Senator Johnston. That appointee, Mr. President, has been knocking at the door of the Senate ever since. Alabama does not consent, Alabama has never consented, to be deprived of her just and equal representation in the Senate of the United We deny it.

What is the excuse, Mr. President? Why should this appointee of the governor, this representative of Alabama, be longer kept out of the Senate? Why should that sovereign State be longer denied her right to representation on the floor of the Senate?

Oh, we are told the requirement of the constitutional amendment has not been met. What is the constitutional amendment? Who of you can tell the others what it means and get an agreement? Great lawyers here have not been able to analyze it and tell what it means. Some of the greatest say that it means one thing and others say it means another thing.

Mr. President, the thing for the Senate to do is just what Senator Pettus said:

When you are in doubt, make a bee line for justice, for truth, and apply the rule of reason to your conclusion.

This, Mr. President, is all I care to say with reference to this matter. I want to repeat, however, that in my judgment those who voted to seat the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Lee] can with equal consistency vote to seat the Senator appointed There is no conflict except in the imagination from Alabama. of men who desire a different result,

I voted to seat Senator Lee. The committee told us that the authorities of the State of Maryland had been advised—and they had acted upon the advice-that the statute was sufficiently broad, although passed 50 years ago. It does not make any difference if the statutes cover the case when they were passed. It will not do to say that the Legislature of Maryland did not have in its mind all contingencies. They were providing for every emergency as wise legislators, just as we did in Alabama. It is said we base our decision in the case mainly upon the fact that the attorney general, the legal adviser of the governor, advised that the governor had authority to order an election under the statute, and that the court sustains that opinion, and therefore we conclude that it was proper that an election should be held under the so-called authority or the real authority supposed to be vested in the governor. In no other way could that contention be sustained.

I ask the Senators on the committee who want to be fair, Why not take the word of the attorney general of Alabama, a great lawyer? Why not take the word of the special election adviser of the governor employed under the statute because of the immense amount of railroad litigation in Alabama, the very ablest man he could find? Why not take the word of the chief justice of the supreme court of appeals? When they tell the governor that he has no authority of law to order an election until the legislature gives it to him, but he has authority under the law to make an appointment to fill this vacancy, why not take that view of the Alabama case as well? Why not apply these things generally? Why make an exception? Why make fish of one and fowl of another?

As to the case which was before us from the State of Maryland, I voted for it; it was right; but why say that the case of the State of Maryland shall be controlled, as we are controlled by the opinion of the attorney general and the courts, but in Alabama we shall not be controlled by the same law officers and we shall not give them the same credit for capacity and honesty that we do the same officers in the State of Maryland? Is that the authority upon which the Senate is to proceed? I can not believe it, Mr. President.

I contend in conclusion that Mr. Glass, the appointee of the governor, is entitled to be seated; I am dismissing the governor's right to appoint under the constitutional amendment. Although I insist equally with those who have discussed it that he had the right, I am confining myself to his right under the statute of the State of Alabama. I am confining my argument to the knowledge—I believe it knowledge—that a United States Senator is a State officer. I am contending that an officer of the United States under the provisions of the Constitution can not be a United States Senator; that he vacates the office immediately upon accepting a United States commission.

For these reasons I appeal to the Senate not to undertake to pass upon this question from a sentimental standpoint. Let us not undertake to pass upon this question upon the idea that the State of Alabama has not literally and strictly complied with the provisions of the seventeenth amendment as we construe it. Is there a doubt in the minds of Senators on this question? Do Senators have a doubt as to the purpose and intent of the seventeenth amendment? Certainly they do, because they can not agree. Then, if you have a doubt, and you must have a doubt, why not resolve that doubt in favor of the State of Alabama? If there is a doubt as to the authority of the governor under the statute that I have referred to, and the decisions of the court made in reference thereto, is it not a doubt about the power of the governor? If that is the case, is it not fair and just and right that the Senate should resolve that doubt in favor of the State?

The State of Alabama has very poor representation on the floor of the Senate. It has one poor Senator, who is not a lawyer, but who has been compelled, Mr. President, under the circumstances to resort to common sense. He has been compelled to ask the Senate to apply common sense and justice and reason to this case, instead of going out and insisting upon a literal construction as to what the seventeenth amendment really means.

I thank the Senate very much, Mr. President, for its attention. Mr. REED. Mr. President, nothing could be more painful to me than to stand on the floor of the Senate and try to keep a good man and a good Democrat from occupying a position that would increase my party's vote by one every time the roll is called on a party question. Entertaining the highest regard for Mr. Glass, knowing that he possesses the qualifications to fill with eminence the high position to which he aspires, and understanding well that he finds a most earnest and eloquent advocate in his colleague, for whom I feel the highest possible regard and respect; believing also that the State of Alabama is entitled to a full representation upon the floor of the Senate—holding to all these views, I yet can not give my consent to the seating of this man simply and only because I have a greater respect and higher regard for constitutional and legal government than I have for party considerations or for the personal esteem and regard I bear any individual.

This, Mr. President, is a government of the people by law. Any government that is not a government by law is not a government by the people. The people can only speak through the laws they enact. In a government by the people whoever acts contrary to the laws enacted by the people denies them the right of self-government. Such a one proposes to substitute, and does substitute, arbitrary power for the public will expressed in the constitution and laws enacted by the people. Arbitrary power in a republic is usurped power. Whoever wittingly tramples upon the fundamentals of the constitution, whoever wittingly violates the principles of the law, violates the rights of the people.

It is all well enough to say that the State of Alabama is entitled to representation by two Senators upon this floor. The State of Alabama is of course entitled to be so represented; but when the Constitution declares that a State is entitled to two representatives in the Senate, it does not mean merely that two men shall sit here claiming to represent a State, but that they shall actually represent the State. They must come clothed with the legal authority to represent the State or they can not represent it in any other sense than as mere usurpers. the people of Alabama have conferred upon the governor the power to speak for them he has no greater right to represent them than any citizen of the State. If you substitute an ap-pointment by the governor of Alabama which he is not authorized to make for an election to be held by the people, you have placed in office a man without right, without title, without authority, who will sit here a usurper of the powers of the people of the sovereign State of Alabama. You have perpetrated upon that State a great wrong, and upon the laws of your country and the Constitution of the land a great outrage.

Let us reason for & moment over this argument of sentiment that "the State is entitled to be represented; that no one is here specially contesting," and that therefore Mr. Glass should be seated, whether he have good title or no title at all. What does that argument mean, Mr. President, except that the Senate of the United States can be composed in whole or in part of men who hold their seats not by warrant of law, not by warrant of the Constitution, but by virtue of some certificate written by a man who had no authority to sign the certificate or to issue it? I am assuming now that it is true that the governor does not have such authority, and I am replying for this moment to the specious argument which has been advanced, that Alabama is entitled to representation, and that therefore Mr. Glass should be seated, even if he have no title. Why, Mr. President, of course Alabama is entitled to be represented; but is Alabama represented when some gentleman of splendld manner and of fine character comes and takes his seat in this Chamber, not by virtue of the authority of the people, or by authority of law, but by virtue of a certificate issued by a man without authority or power to issue it? That is not representation of the State of Alabama; that is not representation according to law; that is not representation under the Constitution; that, sir, is usurpation, and not representation. I do not mean to apply the term unpleasantly.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead] knows, I believe, that when Judge Clayton came here months ago with a certificate exactly like that now presented by Mr. Glass, I diligently sought to find legal grounds justifying the recognition of the judge's credentials. My instincts and desires and prejudices were all that way. I recognized in Judge Clayton a man who would adorn this forum. I was unable then, as I am unable now, to find any principle of law or logic justifying the seating of Judge Clayton. The majority of the committee were of like opinion. Judge Clayton thereupon withdrew from the field. Now comes Mr. Glass with identical credentials, and we are asked to seat him, although at least the majority of the committee found against Judge Clayton. The question is not as to the fitness of these men as individuals, but as to the authority back of them.

One vote may change the most important legislation. If that vote be cast by an unauthorized man, then the ballot is falsified and the result is a false one. There are outside of the Senate Chamber hundreds and thousands of men as patriotic as any here, as able as any here, as just as any here; but do we admit them to vote here? We deny them that right because they speak only as individuals and not as the legal representatives of the people.

If we seat men in this Chamber who are not the legal representatives of the people, then we deny to the people the right to be represented. If the credentials of Mr. Glass are not well grounded in law, if they are issued without authority, and he is given a seat, then the people of Alabama have been twice denied the right—their constitutional right—to representation. I say twice denied, because it has been denied to them in the first instance by the refusal of the governor to take the necessary steps to give them an opportunity to be heard and to express their choice, and because in the second instance a man has been actually inducted into the seat that the people ought to be permitted to fill.

Mr. President, it has been argued here that a United States Senator is a State officer, and therefore it would seem that the corollary sought to be attached is that the Senate has but little to say and that the National Government has but little to say with regard to the right of a man to fill the position of a United States Senator and assist in enacting laws for the government of all the people of the Nation. I utterly deny that proposition. I assert that as the Senate of the United States was created under the Constitution, each individual who sits here must come in conformity with the supreme law of the land. I assert that Senator is not a mere State officer; he is an officer of the United States, a part of the legislative department of the United States, holding his office under the Constitution of the United States, removable by the other Senators who sit here as a part, each of them, of the legislative authority of the United States.

There have been many assertions made that "it is well settled that a Senator is merely a State officer," but I have heard no man refer to a decision sustaining the assertions. I know of no well-considered decision of any court that a United States Senator is merely an officer of the State. The case often citedand the only one I have heard seriously urged-is the Burton case. I maintain that that case sets up no such doctrine; that it does not decide the point at all; and that, in so far as a deduction is to be drawn from the case, it is to the contrary of the contention made. I read from the case of the United States v. Burton, reported in Tw. hundred and second United States Reports, local citation, 369:

Allusion has been made to that part of the judgment declaring that the accused, by his conviction, "is rendered forever hereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States." That judgment, it is argued, is inconsistent with the constitutional right of a Senator to hold his place for the full term for which he was elected, and operates of its own force to exclude a convicted Senator from the Senate, although that body alone has the power to expel its Members.

That is the argument.

Says the court:

Says the court:

We answer that the above words in the concluding part of the judgment of conviction do nothing more than declare or recite what, in the opinion of the trial court, is the legal effect attending or following a conviction under the statute. They might well have been omitted from the judgment. By its own force, without the aid of such words in the judgment, the statute makes one convicted under it incapable forever thereafter of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States. But the final judgment of conviction did not operate, ipso facto, to vacate the seat of the convicted Senator nor compel the Senate to expel him or to regard him as expelled by force alone of the judgment. The seat into which he was originally inducted as a Senator from Kansas could only become vacant by his death or by expiration of his term of office or by some direct action on the part of the Senate in the exercise of its constitutional powers. This must be so for the further reason that the declaration in section 1782, that any office of honor, trust, or profit "under the Government of the United States" refers only to officers created by or existing under the direct authority of the National Government as organized under the Constitution, and not to offices the appointments to which are made by the States, acting separately, albeit proceeding in respect of such appointments under the sanction of that instrument. While the Senate, as a branch of the legislative department, owes its existence to the Constitution and participates in passing laws that concern the entire country, its Members are chosen by State legislatures and can not properly be said to hold their places "under the Government of the United States."

We are of opinion that section 1782 does not by its necessary operation implinge upon the authority or powers of the Senate of the United States nor interfere with the legitimate functions, privileges, or rights of Senators.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.
Mr. MYERS. Laying aside the Senator's contention that United States Senators are Federal officers, excluding United States Senators, can the Senator name any Federal official who owes his title and tenure of office to the people of one State, who owes his office to State authority instead of to Federal authority?

Mr. REED. Yes. Mr. MYERS. W

Who is he?

Mr. REED. A Member of the House of Representatives. Mr. MYERS. I put them in the same class as Senators; we are all Members of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of this discussion, I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that the Supreme Court of the State of Kentucky has held that Members of the House of Representatives are not State officers. I refer Senators to the following cases: Neeley v. McCollum (53 S. W. Rep., 37); Eversole v. Brown (53 S. W. Rep., 527); Donelan v. Bird (118 S. W. Rep., 178). If Members of the House of Representatives are not State officers, I should like to understand the argument by which the conclusion is reached that Senators are State officers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly,

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri to construe the provision of the Constitution which I am about to read:

And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I do not think that is very difficult to construe; but the Senator has some particular point in mind?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I presume it would not be difficult for the Senator from Missouri to construe it.

Mr. REED. What I mean to say is that there is no difficulty in construing the section in its ordinary application; but the Senator evidently has in mind some particular point upon which he desires my views. I wish he would make his point plain.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Missouri is arguing that a Senator from a State is not a State officer. The point I am trying to make is this: If he is a United States officer—and that is the contention of the Senator from Missouri—how could be be a Member of the Senate under this plain provision of the Constitution, which reads:

And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.

That is, a member either of the House of Representatives or of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the plain construction is as though it read "no person holding any other office shall be at the same time a Member of either House."

Mr. BANKHEAD. But it does not read in that way. I want the Senator from Missouri to construe the language as it is in the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the plain intention of the provision read by the Senator is this, and only this: That no man could hold an ordinary office under the Government and at the same time hold a seat in Congress; and it does not, even by implication, lead to the conclusion that Member of Congress is not an officer of the Government of the United States. But, coming back to this decision

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I did not quite finish my ques-The Senator certainly can not name any Federal official, other than a Member of Congress, who owes his title and tenure of office to the people of some one State.

Mr. REED. No; but I can also reply to the Senator that neither he nor anyone else can name any other officer, who they claim is a State officer, who sits here in Congress, because we only have one class of officers of that kind. There is a Senate and a House of Representatives. The Members of the House of Representatives are elected by the people of the various districts. The Senators have heretofore been elected by the legislatures of the States. Now, when the Senator states to me that I can name no other officers of the Federal Government than Representatives and Senators who are elected by the people of some one State, of course, I can not. They are the only ones selected in that way; but, on the other hand, could he name any State officer having the authority to legislate nationally except these? And, hence, I might as well argue that because he can not name others, there being no others, therefore they are necessarily national officers. The argument does not get us anywhere.

Mr. MYERS. I would ask one more question, then, in view of the Senator's reference to Representatives in Congress. It is a well-known fact, is it not, that in the inception of this Government the Representatives were supposed to represent the people of a certain segment of country, while Senators were supposed to represent an entire State in its sovereign capacity and not the people of the State?

Mr. REED. Certainly; that is correct.

Mr. MYERS. That differentiates, then, between Representatives and Senators, even if we consider them Federal officials.

Mr. REED. While it differentiates, it is a differentiation that gets us nowhere, that argues nothing, that proves nothing; it is a distinction, but it does not go to the merits of the contention, as I see it. I have great respect for my friend's opinion, but I observe that the people of a district are authorized to do what? To select a man; and after that man has been selected in that way and he appears in the Halls of Congress and takes his oath of office, the question then is, In what way does he sit here? Does he sit here as an officer of the State or does he sit here as a part of the Government of the United States? That ought to be the test.

Coming back to this decision-and I am spending much more time on this matter than I had intended—as I read the decision in the Burton case, it means nothing more than this, that a Senator of the United States is not an officer of the United States in the sense employed by the statute in the phrase "rendered hereafter forever incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

It seems to me that a proper test is not difficult. It is true that the people of a district elect their Representative; it is true that heretofore the legislatures of the States have elected, and now the people must elect, Senators, but when the Representative or the Senator comes here and takes his oath of office he becomes a part of the legislative authority of the United States. No State has the power to pass a law for his recall. The State of Montana, from which my friend who interrogated me a moment ago comes, can pass a law, if it sees fit to do so, recalling its State officers; it can pass a law, if it sees fit to do so, under which it can impeach its State officers; it can take away the authority which it confers; but the State of Montana can not pass a law to recall a Representative in Congress, because once he has been seated he holds under the authority of the Federal Government: it can not pass a law to recall a Senator of the United States, because he holds here under the Federal Constitution and law. His tenure of office is fixed and his right to a seat is to be determined by this body, and not by the people of that State, once they have sent him here.

You might as well argue that the President of the United States, because he is elected by the people of the States, is not an officer of the Federal Government; yet he represents the executive branch of the Government. You might also as well argue that the judges of the Supreme Court are not officers under the Federal Government because they are merely appointed by the President, who is elected by the electors, who in turn are elected by the people.

As I understand the meaning of the Constitution upon these propositions, it is simply this: That there are three branches of the Government, and there are four separate sources for their The three branches of the Government together constitute the Government, but there is a separate authority and a separate method of selecting each branch. The President is selected, technically speaking, by the votes of the electors, not by the votes of the people. He holds his authority by warrant of that vote. The judiciary hold their offices by virtue of a commission issued to them by the President, which has been approved by the Senate of the United States. The Senators hold their warrant from another source; before the adoption of the seventeenth amendment, by virtue of an election by the State legislatures, and since then by virtue of an election by the people. The Members of the House of Representatives hold their office by virtue of an election by the people of a district. Thus we have four separate sources of selection of the three coordinate branches of the Government. When the individuals thus elected are assembled here in Washington and have taken the oath of office, they, all together, constitute the Government of the United States and are its officers and ministers, possessing powers conferred by the Constitution and statutes of the United States, liable to the pains and penalties prescribed by the Constitution and statutes of the United States. They can be impeached for dereliction of duty, and, in some instances, tried and punished for violating the obligations laid upon them by the laws of the United States. But they are not subject to the regulations of the State, to the laws of the State, to the consti-They occupy their offices under authority of tution of the State. the Federal Constitution and Federal statutes, and are answerable alone to that Constitution and those statutes. If they were State officers, surely the State might pass laws governing and regulating the conduct of its own officers. But no man has ever been so ignorant as to suppose that a State can regulate the conduct of a Representative in Congress or of a United States Senator, of the President, or of the justices of the Supreme

To my mind there is no question about that being a correct construction; but it is not crucial or vital to this case.

If we are to construe a law properly, the first great question we ought to ask is, What was the intent and purpose of the law? What was the road along which we were attempting to travel when we wrote the law? What was the objective point? What was in the mind of those who drew and enacted the law? That What is the guideboard by which our feet ought to be directed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On this point I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. If he had believed, when he was considering this amendment to the Constitution, that if it was adopted, and a vacancy should immediately occur in the State of Missouri, in order to fill it the governor must call a special session of the legislature and issue his writ of election thereafter for an election by the people, would he have voted to submit the amendment to the people for ratification?

Mr. REED. Oh, undoubtedly; undoubtedly. I will say to the Senator, however, that if I had foreseen all of the difficulties that have been conjured up—and I think a part of them without good reason-I should have ventured to suggest that we put into the Constitution itself the exact method to be followed until such time as the States had convened their legislatures Coming back now to the proposition I advanced, that the controlling principle in the construction of any law or any clause of the Constitution is that the object and purpose of those who passed it is to be kept always in mind, and that that is to be the guiding star through all of the processes of construction and application, I ask, What was the purpose of the people of the United States in adopting the seventeenth amendment?

Why, for 100 years and more contention had been going on over the method of selecting Senators. The advocates of direct elections by the people were active a quarter of a century ago. Nearly 20 years ago, if my memory serves me right, a resolution was introduced and, I think, passed in the House of Representatives to substitute for elections by legislative bodies elections by a direct vote of the people. Those who contended for the direct vote of the people insisted upon it on the ground that men selected by legislative bodies did not always represent the sentiment of the country. They insisted that They insisted that there could be no real popular government when between the vote of the people and the election of the officer there intervened an independent body. They contended that it was essential to progress that there should be a direct vote of the people substituted for a vote by a legislative body.

When the Senate came to pass upon this amendment it had that one dominant and controlling principle in mind. It was the only subject that was debated except the clause which it was feared might lead to an interference by Congress with the rights of the States to hold their own elections in their own

Bearing in mind that what we started out to do was to sub-stitute elections by the people for elections or selections by State legislators, that we had nothing in view but the one proposition-to take from legislative bodies the power they possessed and to take from governors the powers they possessed and to confer these powers upon the people directly, to be exercised without let and without hindrance—let us see just what we did. We provided:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years.

I repeat:

The Senate of the United States shall-

Not "may," but "shall "- composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], who so adroitly argued the question here this morning upon the other side, declares that that clause is self-enforcing. Why, Mr. President, every clause of the Constitution of the United States is, and of necessity must be, self-enforcing. It is the supreme law of the land. It supplants all other laws. If it were not self-enforcing it might be rendered null and void by any Congress that saw fit to repeal a statute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. Certainly.
Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand the Senator from Missouri, he says that every clause of the Constitution of the United States is self-enforcing. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. REED. The Senator does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then will the Senator please explain to the Senate how the fourteenth amendment has ever managed to enforce itself?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my very witty friend-for I think that is what he meant to be, witty-

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no, no.

Mr. REED (continuing). Who asked a question and then proceeded toward the door, not because he was running away from me, but because he thought my answer was not worth staying to listen to-

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. Mr. President; if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, I had just received a card asking me to go into the anteroom to see some people who wanted to That was the reason why I was going. I would not see me. have left because I thought the Senator's answer unworthy of I may have had the idea in my mind that it was impossible for him to answer the query satisfactorily. If I had that idea in my mind, I had also in my mind the idea that it was impossible for any Senator to answer it, because I knew the Senator from Missouri was the equal of any Senator in this body in legal ingenuity and in statesmanship. I merely ask him now-and to that question I ask a response, and beg him to believe that I will remain until he answers it-how the fourteenth amendment ever enforced itself?

Mr. REED. The Senator evidently is confusing in his mind the doctrine that a constitutional provision is a vital and a living thing without the aid of a statute and the practical enforcement of the constitutional provision in the affairs of men. Of course the Senator must know the sense in which I have been using this term. For that matter, a statute against horse stealing will not go out and enforce itself without sheriffs; but it is a vital, living statute.

I am drawing the line between a proposition in a constitution that lies dormant, dead and inactive until a statute is passed which makes it an effective thing, and a provision in a constitution which is vital without the aid of any statute. am not drawing a line between a vital, living principle in a constitution and the actual enforcement of it. It is one thing to say in a constitution that all men shall be entitled to a trial in a court, and it is quite another thing to enforce that right; but when you write that kind of a proposition into a constitution any man can enforce it and can stand upon it and have its protection without the aid of a statutory enactment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr President, if I understand the Senator from Missouri, he has now taken the position that a statute against horse stealing can not be enforced unless there are a sheriff and officers to enforce it.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not say what he meant. The Senator said a statute against horse stealing could not be enforced unless there was a statute.

Yes. Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, the Senator did not think I said anything of that kind, did he? Of course, if the Senator simply

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, perhaps I am mistaken about that. Perhaps I am foolish. Perhaps I have misunderstood the Senator from Missouri. Perhaps I have mismeasured what he meant; but I understood him to say that a statute against horse stealing could not be enforced unless there were administrative officers charged with the administration of the law. Is that right?

Mr. REED. If the Senator is going to treat what I have said in that light and frivolous way, I simply decline to yield further and will proceed with my remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I decline to be-

Mr. REED. I decline to yield further, Mr. President. Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rather decline to be convicted solely by the Senator's own judgment of treating him frivolously or lightly. I understood the Senator to say, and I still understand him to have said, that a statute against horse stealing could not be administered unless the sheriffs and the other people did their duty.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I did not say that. The record will show what I said, and I do not intend to pause in my remarks to pick up pins or anything of the kind. I want to go on. To-morrow, when the Record is printed, the Senator can have all the amusement he desires out of anything I have

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire no amusement; I desire enlightenment, if the Senator can give it to me.

Mr. REED. I can not by any possibility enlighten the Senator if he so misunderstood what I said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, I admit that I am perfectly stupid; still, I thought the Senator from Missouri was so wise

Mr. REED. No; the Senator is not perfectly stupid, but he is perfectly persistent, and sometimes he is absolutely inclined to be a bit stubborn; but he is of such a genial and kindly nature that I will not take any possible exception.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the Senator will yield now?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, then, the Senator from Missouri having yielded, I want to ask him what there is in the fourteenth amendment and what there is in the fifteenth amendment that is self-executory?

The Senator has just made the statement that every amendment to the Constitution executed itself. I say that neither the fifteenth amendment nor the fourteenth amendment ever executed itself. That is all I say, and that is serious. That is That is serious. not funny.

Mr. REED. I can not convey to the Senator's understanding, because of my inability to express myself properly and not must go with the trunk.

because of any lack of mental power on his part, the difference between a constitutional provision which is said under the law to be self-executing-to wit, a living, vital principle, and selfexecuting in that sense-and the enforcement of the provisions of that constitution. There is a great difference between a thing being self-executing and self-enforcing. It requires men and machinery of government to enforce a law, to enforce any principle of the Constitution, or to enforce any statute; but that is not the sense in which I used the terms "self-enforcing" and "self-executing." I used the terms in the sense that the provision does not require statutory enactment in order to breathe vitality into it. If I have not made it plain to the Senator now, I can not do it, and I shall go on.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does the Senator decline to yield any further? If he does, of course—
Mr. REED. If the Senator is really serious, and does not comprehend what I say—— Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator knows that I am always serious. Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Mississippi is never quite so serious as when he is attempting to be humorous, and I never have seen him more serious than at this moment. Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, requesting the Senator to submit to an interruption upon the ground that I am humorously serious, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I will yield no further, because the Senator is simply indulging in badinage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right. In that statement the Senator is absolutely incorrect. I was trying to show, in a most serious way, that the position the Senator from Missouri had taken was absolutely without foundation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am glad the incident is over, and that the Senator is at last serious; but I do not intend to take any more time in quibbling about matters of that sort. I have been interrupted, and I think without very good reason. I could not take offense at anything my friend from Mississippi might do, and therefore I pass on.

The provision in the Constitution that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators elected by the people is said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] to be self-enforcing. I will add that of course he is correct in that statement, because, that section having been enacted, if it had stopped at that point it is perfectly plain that no man ever could have taken his seat in the Senate of the United States unless he came here with a certificate of election by the people. No statute of Congress was necessary and no statute of any State was necessary if we had stopped at that point. If that provision of the Constitution is self-enforcing, if the Members of the Senate must be elected by the people, then every other provision must be equally selfenforcing.

The following language-

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures—is also self-enforcing. The only way you can get into the United States Senate under this provision, as far as I have just read, is by an election by the people. The Constitution prescribes what the qualifications of the electors shall be, and no State or Federal statute is necessary to breath vitality into that provision of the Constitution.

We have now arrived at a point, if I am correct, where the only way by which you can get warrant of authority to sit in the United States Senate is by an election by the people; and that is a vital, living principle of the Constitution of the United States. It applies not only in Arkansas, Alabama, and Mississippi, but, like every other provision of the Constitution of the United States, it is universal in its application. It touches every State of the Union at the same time and in exactly the same way. There never yet has been a provision in the Constitution that proceeded to become a vital thing in one State and a dead thing in another State. The Constitution must be universal in its application; the rule by which Senators are to come to this body under the Constitution must be the same for Kansas as for Mississippi, and the right must be based upon a vote of the people with the single exception that is provided in the Constitution.

Of course it is admitted that Mr. Glass does not come here with the vote of the people. If he comes here at all, then he must come within the language of the exception, the provision that is made in the Constitution. If the main branch of this section is self-enforcing and is vital, then the qualifying clause must go with the main branch. You can not say that the main clause is vital and self-enforcing and in the next breath say that the qualifying clause is not equally vital, because the limb

Now, what is the exception? What is the other way that is provided?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. Yes; if the Senator wishes to ask me a question. Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I desire to ask the Senator a ques-

The seventeenth amendment provides that Senators shall hold their offices for six years, and that each one of them shall have one vote, and that they shall be chosen by an election of the people in the respective States. Suppose the governor and the legislature of a given State were not to provide for an election at all: Would the Senator contend that that State had no right to representation in this body?

Mr. REED. I should contend that the people of that State, having been foolish enough to elect a governor of that kind and a legislature of that sort, would have to proceed to get them out of office and elect somebody that would permit the people of the State to be represented. I certainly should contend that a governor who stood there denying the people the chance to vote, violating their very fundamental rights, would not have au-thority by virtue of that violation to name a man to come down here and sit in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, again-

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I always dislike to refuse to be interrupted, but the Senator is really breaking in on the thread of what I am trying to say. If he will permit me to get through with that, I shall be glad then to answer any questions he may wish to ask me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I always try to break in on the thread of what is being said.

Mr. REED. Very well. I thought that was the Senator's

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator does not wish me to break in on the thread, I shall not do it. The Senator has just said that if there was a governor so traitorous and a legislature so disloyal as not to pass a law in accordance with the seventeenth amendment, he thinks, as I understand him, that that State ought to be deprived of its representation as long as that condition in the State lasted. I should like to ask him what he makes out of the main constitutional provision, which is that each State shall have two Senators, each entitled to one vote? That is in the old Constitution.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, when you say that each State shall have two Senators elected by a vote of the people, you have conferred upon the people of that State the right to be represented, if they want to be represented, and want to be represented in the right way. If there is a wicked governor or a stubborn governor or a foolish governor who refuses to set in motion the machinery by which the people can elect, you do not at all meet that difficulty by saying, in substance, "This governor refuses to allow the people to elect, and therefore we will permit him to consummate that wrong by allowing him, without authority, to appoint a man himself."

That does not reach the difficulty. If the law provides that a man shall sit here by virtue of a vote of the people, and a man sits here by virtue of something else than the vote of the people, no matter how good a man he is, the people are without representation; the Constitution has been ravished; the people have been deprived of their rights not only by omission but by commission in such a case. It is as much a denial to the people of Alabama of the right to be represented here, if that is done wrongfully by the action of the governor, as it would be if in the Constitution we had provided that Alabama should not be represented.

All the Constitution can do, and all the Government here can do, is to give to each State an equal chance to be represented. Then if a State should refuse for any reason to avail itself of this equal opportunity, that is the fault of the State, and not the fault of the Constitution nor of the Federal Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me just a little bit further, the Senator, according to my construction of what he said-possibly not according to his construction of it-has confessed that this amendment is not self-executing; that there must be a law within the State in order to execute it. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the amendment itself. Even if it were self-executing, if it executed itself without further legislation, it would execute itself in all the verbiage of the amendment, and not in a part of it alone. The Senator seems to think the only part of the amendment which is law is-

Mr. REED. I should like to inquire if this is a question that the Senator is asking?
Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it is a question.

Mr. REED. I wish, then, the Senator would put it in an interrogatory form, just for the sake of the parliamentary situ-

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. President, I will search my intellectual acumen in order to see that it goes into an interroga-ory form.

If it be true, as the Senator admits, that this amendment is interrognot self-executing, as I understand him now-that is interrogatory form, I think; then I wish to ask the Senator whether or not all the parts of this amendment are not equally self-executing, or equally self-nonexecuting, whichever they may be? That is interrogatory, too. Then, when I have done that, I will ask the Senator whether this language is not a part of the amend-

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

Still pursuing the interrogatory form, which seems to be demanded by the Senator, I would ask him as to whether this amendment does not contemplate these three things: First, that the Senator shall be elected by the people instead of by the legislature as under the old Constitution; secondly, that when a vacancy happens in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of the State is not permitted to issue writs of election to fill such vacancy; and as to whether there is not a proviso to the clause to this effect:

That the legislature of any State may empower

"May empower"; not must empower, but "may empower"; not self-executing, but voluntary-may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until-

And I ask the Senator to mark the word "until "- the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.

Now, in this Alabama case the legislature Mr. REED. Is that a part of the question, Mr. President? The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is In doubt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not going to decide that question. Mr. WILLIAMS. In this Alabama case the legislature has not directed any way for the governor to fill the vacancy, and therefore this proviso is that the executive may make temporary appointment until the legislature provides for filling the vacancy. Then, there follows this language:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

Then, still in the interrogatory form, I ask the Senator whether Senator Johnston was not chosen before this amendment became valid as a part of the Constitution?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it was not intended that I should answer. I think it was only intended that I should be treated with considerable disrespect. I decline to answer that sort of question-

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President-

Mr. REED. And I decline to be further interrupted by any Senator until I have concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I shall not seek further to interrupt the Senator, but I do wish to say that I meant no disrespect at all to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has the floor and declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. REED. I was discussing the proposition that the first provision we are met with is that there shall be an election by the people, and I had come to the further proposition that there was an exception to that method. What is it?

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

I ought to say again that at this point and up to this point it is purely and absolutely an election by the people. Every original election must be by the people. Every election to fill a va-cancy must be by the people. The express command is laid upon the governor of a State to issue his writ of election and to call the people together and give them the opportunity which we sought to give them.

There is but one way to avoid that method of selecting a Senator, to comply with the provision contained in the Constitution. Until you have complied with the qualifying provision there is no man who can sit in this body unless he holds his warrant by virtue of an election by the sovereign people of a State. That one way is-

That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancles by election as the legislature may direct.

Now, note that language. The legislature empowers the executive to make temporary appointment until when? Until the next general election? No. Until the legislature shall assemble? No. For a period of three months or six months or a year? No. Until the term of office of the man who receives the temporary appointment shall have expired? No. It is until the people shall elect as the legislature may direct.

Now, what does that mean? As plainly to my mind as anything can be indicated by words, it means that before a governor shall appoint power shall have been conferred upon him to appoint. Until that power has been conferred upon him to appoint the power rests in the people to elect. It is a question of power, and unless power has been conferred upon him to do that which otherwise the people alone have power to do, then he is as much without authority as though he were not the governor of the State.

Besides that, to my mind it was plainly contemplated in the constitutional provision that when the legislature conferred the power upon the governor to appoint, it should in the act giving that power fix the period when an election should be held. constitutional provision implied two things-first, that the legislature must convene and must give the governor power to appoint, and second, that they must in the act creating the power fix a time when the people will come into their own and have the chance to elect a successor.

If the legislature were to meet and confer the authority upon a governor to appoint, and stop at that point, I do not believe he could make a valid appointment. I believe that in order that the governor might have authority to make a valid appointment under a legislative act the legislature must give him the direct power to appoint and at the same time must provide that the people of that State shall have a chance to elect, and that the appointment must cease when that hour or day of election has

It was not intended, Senators, when we adopted this provision of the Constitution, that it would be given away, or that it could be rendered nugatory, or that it could be stricken dead by the stubbornness of disposition of any man not to accept its terms and provisions. It was not intended that the governor of a State could say: "I will deprive the people of the State of a chance to elect a Senator by arbitrarily exercising the power to do it myself." It was not contemplated that the governor of Kansas might say: "I prefer to appoint, and therefore, I will not assemble the legislature; I will retain in my own hands this power, that after a hundred years of battle was conferred upon the people. I will retain it by denying the legislature the opportunity to convene and fix a date of election. I will deny it by refusing to call the election. I will take over to myself the power of appointment and the power to nullify the old provisions of the Constitution and the power to defy the will of the people and deprive them of their right to vote by arbitrarily sitting here and deprive them of their right to vote by arbitrarily sitting here and saying, 'I will give no such right; and, therefore, I will absorb it to myself.'" Deny it as you may, quibble as you may, twist and squirm mentally as Senators may seek to do, the cold, plain, bald fact confronting the Senate is that if we seat the Senator appointed from Alabama we shall establish the proposition that every State gov-ernor in this Nation can nullify this provision of the Constitution and set it at naught until we arrive at the day when the terms of Senators shall have expired.

Not even then, for yet it might be argued as to any man coming here by the appointment of a governor that there is no law that calls for an election of a Senator; there has been no machinery provided if the governor refuses to call the legislature together; there has been no law enacted, and therefore we will continue to hold in the hands of governors the power to appoint and the power to keep men in office indefinitely, whereas under the old Constitution the most they could do was to appoint until the next meeting of the legislature.

Why, what a condition of chaos you would have here. that is necessary is for a governor to refuse to act and thereby he acquires and takes over to himself a power that the Consti-Whenever tution of the United States placed in the people. the Senate seats a man under those circumstances it has certified to the country that the constitutional provision that was fought for for a hundred years is, after all, a mere thing on paper, which can be nullified in its effect by the governors of the several States if they simply refuse to convene the legislatures or to have them enact any law for the election of a Senator. Is anybody here prepared to take that position?

I pass to another question. A constitution must be universal in its application. This was intended to be universal and to give to the citizens of this country a universal right to have a voice in the election of a Senator. It is the constitutional right of the humblest citizen of Alabama; it is the sacred right of the humblest citizen in Alabama, to be permitted to cast his vote for a United States Senator from the State of Alabama. It is as much his right to cast his vote for a Senator from the State of Alabama as it is to cast his vote for the President of the United States or for the governor of his own State. Whether the man is working in his overalls and covered with mire and dirt from the street or whether he is the wealthiest man in the community, no man can lawfully deprive him of that sovereign right to cast his vote for a United States Senator.

Mr. President, this battle is too long to be thrown away at the end of the struggle. Some of my friends upon the other side who are paying me the compliment of their attention were valiant soldiers battling in this great contest for the right of the people to cast their votes direct for United States Senators. Upon this side we have been a solid phalanx. We have said it was essential to the very welfare of the American Republic that the people should have the right to vote direct. We have said that men should no longer sit here holding their warrant of office from a legislature. We have said that the people were by right entitled to this great privilege and prerogative. conferred it upon them, but the governor of Alabama refuses to permit them to act.
Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President-

Mr. REED. He refuses in this way— The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. In a moment. I am making no attack upon the governor. He refuses to issue his writ of election, and if there be not law to warrant that he declines to assemble the legislature and allow a law to be passed either conferring upon him the authority to appoint and fixing a time when the people shall vote or enacting a statute under which a special election can be held; and because he refuses to do that, although the way is open and the path is clear, he assumes that it is our duty then to seat a man here who, when he takes his seat, though he shall occupy it with the highest honor as a man, will nevertheless be sitting in a place that was not filled by the people of Alabama, that was not filled under the laws of Alabama, that was not filled under the laws and Constitution of the United States, but was filled by the demand of the very man who refuses the people an opportunity to vote as we intended they should vote under this provision of the Constitution.

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if the Missouri Legislature has been in regular session or in extra session since the adoption of the seventeenth amendment?

Mr. REED. It has not.
Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if there is a statute in Missouri under which he believes an election could be held to conform to the provisions of the seventeenth amendment?

Mr. REED. There is some question in my mind as to that. And if it does not exist, unless the act is passed here which has been advanced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I shall insist that the legislature shall be assembled for that

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the fact remains that this amendment has been in effect according to the contention of the Senator from Missouri for eight months or about that time. It may have been that during that time there might have been a vacancy in the Senate from Missouri. Now, as I understand, the Senator from Missouri has taken no step, given no advice, so far as I know; he has not urged on the governor of Missouri the importance or necessity for calling an extra session of the legislature in order that this amendment might be put in force. The fact remains, and is known to all men, that one of the Senators from Missouri has been critically ill for the last few weeks. Why has not the Senator been active and had the legislature convene in order to provide that the constitutional amendment should be made effective?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suppose that a question of law under the Constitution and the right of a man to a seat in this body ought not to be settled by whether I have done something that I ought or ought not to have done outside of the Senate Chamber. That is the kind of argument we have had here since this whole discussion began. It has not been an argument of what are the legal rights, but what are the conveniences of the occasion; it has not been a question of whether a man has come here backed by proper authority and with a legal badge and warrant of office in his hand, but whether it would have distressed somebody or disturbed somebody or inconvenienced somebody to have let the people exercise their right under the Constitution. If we had passed this constitutional amend-ment with such provisions that every State legislature would necessarily have been convened before we could have filled a single vacancy, still that inconvenience would not have warranted us in seating a man here who had no right here, nor would it have afforded reason for allowing usurpers of the rights of the people to sit here.

But what is the inconvenience? The governor of Alabama has the right to assemble the legislature. The legislature, when as-sembled, has the right to authorize the governor to appoint, provided they also specify that the appointment shall be until there is an election, and shall provide for the election. Because it has not been deemed necessary by the governor, or because the governor did not want for some reason to assemble his legislature, because he failed to do his plain duty, we are asked to violate our duty. Because it would be inconvenient for the governor of Alabama to assemble his legislature in order to proceed in a legal way to send us a representative and to carry out the spirit of this constitutional amendment, we are asked to violate our oath of office and to seat somebody as a matter of convenience but not as a matter of law,
Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Will the Senator from Missouri permit merely a suggestion at that point?

Mr. REED. Of course I do not mean that a Senator who votes differently from me will have violated his oath of office, if that be his conscience.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know that the Senator would never mean that; there is no Senator in the Chamber who would make that kind of an assertion, and neither late nor early would the Senator from Missouri make it.

The point, however, with me is simply this: Inasmuch as the Senator disagrees with some of the real talent of this body as lawyers, and also disagrees with other Senators, and there is no contest, in the light of that provision of the Constitution which says that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its representation in this body, is it not possible for us to compromise the matter on this ground? I am not entirely satisfied with the decision in the Maryland case, but I unhesitatingly voted to sent Mr. Lee because the authorities of the State of Maryland interpreted the Constitution in the way they did; and I voted with great pleasure to carry out the will of those people. In the case of the State of Alabama the same thing occurred, except through a different process. Those people believed, as I believed, that the appointment of a Senator by the governor of Alabama was perfectly valid. Now, the question comes before us as Senators, without saying anything about violating our oaths or taking any such extreme ground as that, to decide in our consciences in this new presentation of the case as to two States, both wanting to do the fair thing. One State takes one course-and I agree with its authorities in their interpretation-and the other State takes another course and proceeds in a way where there is no possibility of any serious harm resulting hereafter as a mere matter of precedent. The Senator from Missouri, with his legal ability, which we all appreciate, disagreeing with other lawyers of almost equal distinction on the floor, is it not possible for us to arrive at a common understanding?

Then it comes to the question as to the other provision of the Constitution that each State is entifled to its representation here. Shall we quibble as to technicalities on the part of the Constitution in order to violate another provision of the Constitution which demands that this body shall contain two Senators from each State? In other words, each State has proceeded in the best manner it could. There is no objection to the applicant, so far as we know, and no contest. I confess-and I do not want to detain the Senator from Missouri longer-that if there were opposition here from the State of Alabama, if the people of the State of Alabama were crying out against this action by the governor, I would search very deeply the question as to the constitutionality of admitting Mr. Glass, but I would not hunt for quibbles, so far as I am concerned, as to whether or not, under a strict construction of the Constitution, the State of Alabama should have but one Senator in this body simply because the authorities of the State from which the Senator comes have misinterpreted the meaning of the constitutional amendment, according to the view that the Senator from Missouri or I happen to have of it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is a little hard just to answer my friend, as he did not ask me a question, but made a very

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It was merely a suggestion.
Mr. REED. A pleasant and, I must say, a somewhat convincing presentation. If I could only agree with the Senator as to his fundamentals, if I could only agree with him that this is a question of nonessentials, I would readily agree with him to vote to seat Mr. Glass, for I should like to seat Mr. GLASS. I like the man, from what I have seen of him; I like that vote on this side of the Chamber; but, Mr. President, we are not discussing nonessentials. Suppose the best man in the world were to come to that door at this moment and ask to be seated as a representative of a State and said. "I will come in here and sit down and vote honestly and I will represent a State;" would the State be represented? Manifestly, unless the State sent him here to represent it he would be a mere in-

The question, therefore, which we must answer by our votes and upon our consciences is, Does Mr. Glass represent the State of Alabama, and is he entitled as a representative of the State of Alabama to sit here in this Chamber? Unless he comes with credentials granted to him under the law as the representative of the people of that State, he has no more authority to sit here than the stranger to whom I referred in my illustration a moment ago.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President-

Mr. REED. Just a moment, and then I will yield. That being true, we owe it, not only to the Senate of the United States, but we owe it to the people of Alabama, and we owe it to the people of every other State, diligently to inquire, Does Mr. GLASS represent the State of Alabama? It is true that the State of Alabama is entitled to equal representation with the other States. It is true that the State of Alabama has the right to have two Senators upon this floor; but if the State of Alabama has sent one Senator, and a man who happens to be governor, and who is without authority to act, has sent another gentleman here, the State is not represented merely because there are two men sitting here; it is only when they come from the State under the law that they represent the State or the people thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that merely accentuates the difference I was trying to make clear a while ago, but probably I did not succeed as well as I should like to have done. I would not vote to seat a man in the Senate of the United States unless I thought he came here under the sanction of the law in the case. firmly convinced, so far as I am concerned, that Mr. Glass has an absolutely clear title. Under my construction of the seventeenth amendment I do not believe that technically the people of the State in that case had the right to elect at all. The Senator from Missouri takes the extreme opposite view. In the case of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Lee], this body acted in accordance with the expressed will of the State under their interpretation of the constitutional amendment as to the meaning of which the Senator from Missouri and I disagree. In the pending case there is no contest from the State of Alabama as to the seating of Mr. Glass, as there was none, so far as I know, in the Maryland case. In acting in this particular instance and in construing the constitutional amendment as it has construed it, the State of Alabama has done the best it could. It sends its undisputed, unquestioned representative here; and I say, having that view of the case, and believing also that Mr. Glass has a perfectly legal title to the seat, it does not follow that because I want to seat him it is a question of whether or not our consciences are clear in the matter.

Mr. REED. The trouble with the Senator's statement is that he assumes the case. He says that the State has sent a man here who is unquestionably its representative. Well, if he is unquestionably its representative, he ought to be seated: but the question is whether he is the representative of the State

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That depends upon whether or not he was legally appointed.

Mr. REED. That depends upon whether, under the law, he was legally appointed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is our difference; that is all. Mr. REED. When we come to that question, I have a word or two to say upon it. I will say at this point that I would have been through with my remarks in 20 minutes from the time I began if I had not been interrupted, because I had but a few observations that I wanted to make.

I stated a good while ago, before these interruptions, that the first thing we did under this constitutional provision was to authorize the people to elect. Then we provided that the legislature of the State might empower the governor to appoint until the people filled the vacancy by election, as the legislature may direct. If the legislature had met, and only if the legislature had met and given that authority to the governor, would he have authority to appoint.

If there were upon the statute books of Alabama a general statute authorizing the governor to appoint, and if there were also some time fixed in some way for an election to be held by the people, if the governor were to seek to appoint until that the man, from all I have heard of him; and I should like to have election could be held as provided by law, I would be perfectly, willing to waive all technicalities and to vote to seat a man coming here under those circumstances, because there would be at least some color of right vested in the governor to make the appointment, and there would be secured to the people in the statutes of the State the certainty of an opportunity to elect; but, Mr. President, that is not the case. No such statute exists; no statute that can be construed or tortured into conferring that kind of right is yet upon the statute books of the State of Alabama. Here is the statute which has been cited to us. Follow its language:

That when any office of the State, of any county, or municipality thereof, is vacant from death, resignation, removal from the municipality, county, or State, or because the former incumbent absconds, or because an incumbent has been removed for ineligibility, or when the office is vacant from any other cause, and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office, the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

What says the Constitution, if you undertake to apply that to the seventeenth amendment:

Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

That is to say, the legislature may meet; they may authorize the governor to make a temporary appointment until the day of election rolls around, which they are to fix in the very law by which they give him this authority; and the appointment is until the election can be held, and no longer. But, says the statute of Alabama, even if we grant that it applies, or can be made to apply, to this case, the governor shall appoint to fill the unexpired term of that office. The Constitution declares that he shall not have authority to appoint to fill an unexpired term; he shall only have authority to fill the office until the people elect, when it is expressly conferred. Elect whom? Elect a man whose office will begin at the end of the term? No: the governor shall merely make a temporary appointment to be held until the people shall elect somebody to take the place of the man he temporarily appointed; whereas, under the statute of Alabama, if it gives him any authority at all, if it can be made to apply to this case by the loosest of construction, his authority is to appoint, not until the people elect, but clear to the end of the term of office; and that clause of the Constitution which provides for the right of the people to elect is nullified and stricken down during the entire term.

Now, Senators, there is not any escape from that. We seated the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Lee] upon the express ground that this provision of the Constitution had reposed in the people the power to elect; that it superseded the old method; that at the same time it conferred upon the people the power to elect it had taken away from the legislatures the power to choose; that at the same moment it conferred upon the people the power to elect it had taken away from the governor the power to appoint; that those old powers were dead and gone into the limbo of the past; that in lieu of them we had set up the living proposition that the people should elect, and that no governor could appoint until the legislature had expressly authorized him to appoint, and then only for such time as should intervene between the date of the appointment and an election to be held in accordance with the provisions of the very law that confers upon the governor the power of appointment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Suppose this were a proposition to seat Mr. Glass to serve until his successor should be elected by the people of Alabama. What would the Senator say?

Mr. REED. I should say that could not be done, but I should say there would be more doubt about it. If our friends from Alabama had brought up a statute saying "the governor of the State shall have full power and authority to appoint to fill any vacancy until such time as the people shall elect a successor, and the successor shall be elected at an election to be whether it is the next regular election or a special one, in that case there would have been very great doubt; but no such statute exists. The statute here is in the very teeth of the Constitution. The Constitution says that the governor can not appoint unless the legislature has given him authority to appoint, and then he can appoint only until such time as the people shall elect in accordance with the provisions of the statute; whereas the statute of Alabama provides, if you make it apply at all, that the appointment shall be for the rest of the term.

To use a concrete illustration, the statute contemplated that upon the death of Senator Johnston if the legislature had been in session it could have enacted a statute authorizing the governor to appoint a successor and stipulating that he should hold until an election was held; not for his term of office, for it could not have done that. In the case before us, however, we do not even have that sort of an attempt. The statute under which the governor of Alabama is trying to act does not permit the appointment of a temporary holder of this office, but compels the governor, if he appoints at all, to appoint for the entire term. If we should act under this statute, the people never could have a chance to elect a successor to the late lamented Senator Johnston.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. Certainly; I yield. I am about to yield the floor. Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to interrupt just for one moment, to ask a question.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator from Missouri has read the opinion of the governor's legal advisers, he has seen that they state that under the statute the governor has the unquestioned right to appoint, but when he undertakes to appoint for the unexpired term he comes in conflict with the constitutional amendment; and in that case the appointee must give place to his successor when the successor is elected by the people of Alabama, which may be next week or next month or two months

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, just as in the present situation, when the legislature meets it does away with the appointment of the governor, and when the people elect it does away with the appointment of the governor. It is a question of the power of the governor to appoint, not what may happen to be the term for which he appoints.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is perfectly understood by the governor and by his legal advisers and by the courts of Alabama that there is no question about his right to appoint under the statute and the constitutional amendment; but when he undertakes to appoint for the unexpired term he comes in conflict with the amendment, and there the statute gives way to the constitutional amendment. As soon as an election can be held, if there is any law in Alabama to authorize it—and I am authorized to say that it will be done very soon—and the person elected comes here with the certificate of the governor that he has been elected by the people of Alabama, he will take his seat in the Senate and Mr. Glass will walk out.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator states that the legal advisers of the governor tell him now—

Mr. BANKHEAD. He understands that to be the law.

Mr. REED. That he can not appoint to fill the unexpired term; that the provision of the statute which states that he shall appoint to fill the unexpired term gives way to the constitutional provision; but what takes its place? It is void because it is in conflict with the Constitution, but it still remains for the Legislature of Alabama to comply with the Constitution and give the express power. You can not get away from that by saying that that clause of the statute is void, because even if it was void and the Constitution overrode it, the Constitution yet is not answered, for the Constitution declares that the people shall elect and that the legislature shall provide the time of That is the way I construe it. So you do not get election. out of your difficulty at all by saying that the Constitution takes the place of the statute, for the Constitution does not take its place. The Constitution says the Legislature of Alabama shall do something which yet remains undone.

Mr. President, I have talked longer than I have ever before talked on the floor of the Senate at any one time. I rose to talk not to exceed 10 or 15 minutes. Constant interruptions have forced me, in a way, to extend my remarks. I apologize to the Senate for taking so much time, for I do not believe in very long speeches.

I wish to say, in conclusion, that if I could find any way to justify the seating of Mr. GLASS and at the same time preserve what I believe to be the plain intent and purpose of the Constitution, I should gladly vote to seat him. I should do the same thing if he were a Senator representing the other party, for this question rises above politics. This question is more far-reaching than one of the moment. The decision we render in this case will become a precedent in other cases. A bad law and bad decisions never yet have failed to produce bad results long after the decisions were rendered. I can take such a decision as is advocated by some of my brethren in this Chamber in this case and lay it beside the decision rendered by this body upon the Lee case a few days ago, and from the two I can deduce with perfect logic the conclusion that each State has a right to select its Senators in almost any way it chooses; and in the days to come we shall be plagued by precedents of that kind.

Then I have a final word. I can not give my consent to the doctrine that permits a governor to refuse the sovereign people of his State an opportunity to exercise their right under the Constitution of the United States, and, having refused that right to the people, then to assert that the right comes over to himself. I can not give my consent to the doctrine that all that is necessary to give to a governor the right to name a United States Senator is for that governor to refuse to the sovereign people of his State the right to select a Senator under the Constitution of the United States. In its last analysis that is this case.

The miserable doctrine we have heard here, that it costs something to call a legislature together, and the still more miserable doctrine, that a State is entitled to be represented by two men, and therefore it can be represented by one man selected according to law and by another man put in in defiance of law, and that that answers the Constitution or gives a man warrant of title in this office, are as abominable to me as the doctrine to which I first adverted. The shifting doctrine that the State is entitled to somebody, and therefore we ought to let in anybody. is another doctrine to which I will not subscribe.

The governor of Alabama will assemble his legislature, as he has the right to do. If he will gain from them the authority to send Mr. Glass here and fix a time when the people can exercise their right under the Constitution, then I shall be glad to be one of those to welcome Mr. Glass, not as the representative of a governor, not as a man who comes here with a spurious title to office, but as a representative of the splendid State of Alabama, speaking for her people upon the floor of this Chamber.

When I used the term "usurper" and these other terms I did not mean in any way to reflect upon the integrity or good faith of any man. I hope that is plainly understood.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 4, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 3, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, lead us by the inner light to the higher altitudes of life that we may see with clearer vision, hear with keener ear, and walk with firmer step toward the goal for which we all long in our better moments, that we may do our work with greater facility and efficiency, leaving in our wake a path which those who shall come after us may tread with impunity. For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. Oglesby, for five days, on account of illness. QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GORDON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GORDON. A question of personal privilege. On the floor of the House yesterday the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] made this reference to me:

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gordon] in an unkind, uncalled for, and contemptible manner, referred to the people of the South.

Mr. Speaker, the only reference I made to the people of the South was confined to certain mountain districts of the South, similar to those represented by the gentleman from Tennessee. I think the use of the word "contemptible" is unparliamentary, and I think it ought to be stricken from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio move to strike it out?

Mr. GORDON. I will move to strike it out, Mr. Speaker. Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. If a Member uses unparliamentary language the question must be raised at the time the language is used. The gentleman can not correct the Record by moving to strike out as unparliamentary a part of a Member's

The SPEAKER. The correct proceeding is, when the offensive language is used, to have it taken down and proceed to determine the question at the time.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio let it go over for the present; I think the matter can be arranged.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Ohio willing to have the matter go over?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; for the present, Mr. Speaker.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House will automatically resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

STANDARD BOX FOR APPLES.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 11178, establishing a standard box for apples, and for other purposes, and the bill H. R. 12666, establishing a standard box for apples, and for other purposes, which were improperly referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, that committee having jurisdiction thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to change the reference of the bills H. R. 11178 and 12666, establishing a standard box for apples, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL DAIRY CONGRESS (S. DOC. NO. 400).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision of law contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that-

Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event, without first having specific authority of law to do so—

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of Switzerland to that of the United States to send delegates to the Sixth International Dairy Congress, to be held at Berne from the 8th to the 10th of June, 1914, and a letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, showing the favor with which the Department of Agriculture views the proposed gathering.

It will be observed that the acceptance of the invitation will involve no special appropriation of money by the Government.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 2, 1314.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6060, the immigration bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6060, the immigration bill, with Mr. Hay in the chair.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment, as amended, offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Haves], which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Raker offers the following as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from California as amended:

"Provided, That the term 'Asiatic laborer' for all purposes hereof shall be understood to mean a native of any country or district or island adjacent thereto, situate east of a line composed of the Red Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, the Egean Sea, the Sea of Marmora, the Black Sea, the Caucasus Mountains, the Caspian Sea, the Ural River, and the Ural Mountains, with the exception of Turkey in Asia; but the said term shall not be understood to include aliens the immigration of whom into the United States is regulated by existing agreements as to passports."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a substitute.

Mr. RAKER. But the Clerk did not read it quite correctly. The first is "all Asiatic laborers."

Mr. GARDNER. But where does it come in? The amend-

Mr. GARDNER. But where does it come in? The amendment does not even say that.

Mr. RAKER. It is a substitute for the Hayes amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. But the committee does not know where the Hayes amendment is proposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman from California desire the substitute he offers to be placed in the bill?

Mr. RAKER. It strikes out the following, on page 6, after the word "prescribed" in line 22:

persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into.

The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] moved to strike that out and offered an amendment for it. Mr. LENROOT offered an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], which was adopted. is a substitute for the Hayes amendment as amended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is not a substitute for the Hayes amendment as it was reported.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this covers the identical subject intended to be covered, which is Asiatic immigration.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will send up his amendment so it can be reported, very well, but as it was reported it is not a substitute,

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the substi-

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a substitute as reported. No one knows where it is proposed to put it in the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it be amended by saying where it comes in, on lines 22, 23, 24, 25, and 26, on page 6, of the bill H. R. 6060, now under consideration by the House.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want all that put into his amendment?

Mr. RAKER. Strike out that language and insert mine.

[AN. The Chair thinks the substitute is in The CHAIRMAN. order. The bill provides what persons shall not become eligible, and the gentleman from California [Mr. Hayes] offered an amendment striking out certain words in the bill, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lengoor] offered an amendment, the amendment to the amendment being agreed to, and now the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] offers a substitute for the amendment as amended.

Mr. MANN. Well, where will it come in the bill? It takes the place of all the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it necessary for a substitute for an amendment which has been agreed to. The substitute does not have to say where it comes in the bill, because the amendment for which the gentleman proposes to offer a substitute does say where it comes in.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think the amendment which was agreed to strikes out and inserts. Now the gentleman offers as a substitute a proposition, without indicating where it comes in the bill. It does not come in place of what was proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is just what it does. The amendment proposes to strike out and then substitute for the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Can the Chair indicate from the propositions which are pending before the committee where it does come in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It comes in after the word "prescribed," line 22, page 6.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from California want to have it inserted after the word "prescribed," without striking out anything there?

The CHAIRMAN. It strikes out those words and inserts as substitute.

The substitute must be complete in itself. Mr. MANN.

The CHAIRMAN. It is complete in itself.

Mr. MANN. No; as reported, it does not propose to strike out anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair thinks that is a technicality.

Mr. MANN. A technicality, but the House must remember when the engrossing clerk engrosses it he must know,

Mr. RAKER. I offered to strike out all after the word "pre-Mr. RAKER. I offered to strike out an after the word scribed," in line 22, page 6, down to and including the word "into," in line 28, page 6, the amendment of Mr. Hayes, as amended by Mr. Lenroot, and offer this as a substitute in place thereof, to be printed at this place commencing from the word "prescribed."

Mr. MANN. The engrossing clerk must know exactly where it comes in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute as amended as the gentleman from California proposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "prescribed," in line 22, down to and including the word "into," in line 26, and—

Mr. MADDEN. What page? The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, and insert the following:

"Provided, That the term 'Asiatic laborer' for all purposes hereof shall be understood to mean a native of any country or district or island adjacent thereto, situate east of a line composed of the Red Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, the Ægean Sea, the Sea of Marmora, the Black Sea, the Caucasus Mountains, the Caspian Sea, the Ural River, and the Ural Mountains, with the exception of Turkey in Asia, but the said term shall not be understood to include aliens the immigration of whom into the United States is regulated by existing agreements as to passports."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. MOORE. The term "Asiatic laborer" is referred to in this proposed substitute as if it had appeared previously in the Mr. RAKER offers the following as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from California as amended:

"All Asiatic laborers: Provided, That the term 'Asiatic laborer' for all purposes hereof shall be understood to mean a native of any country or district or island adjacent thereto situate east of a line composed bill. That language does not appear in the bill,

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the words "all static laborers" are not included in the amendment. Asiatic laborers" are not included in the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. The term "Asiatic laborer" is referred to as if it had previously appeared.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Clerk failed to read the amendment as offered by the gentleman from California. There are three words prior to the word "provided" that are in the substitute as offered which the Clerk did not read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of line 22 after the word "prescribed" down to and including the word "into," line 26, on page 6, and insert the following: "All Asiatic laborers"—

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman from California does not wish to insert that as part of his amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes. Mr. SHERLEY. With the proviso. Mr. RAKER. That is all marked in one quotation.

The Clerk read as follows:

All Asiatic laborers: Provided, That the term "Asiatic laborer" for all purposes hereof shall be understood to mean a native of any country or district, or island adjacent thereto, situate east of a line composed of the Red Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, the Egean Sea, the Sea of Marmora, the Black Sea, the Caucasus Mountains, the Caspian Sea, the Ural River, and the Ural Mountains, with the exception of Turkey in Asia, but the said term shall not be understood to include aliens the immigration of whom into the United States is regulated by existing agreements as to passports.

Mr. LENBOOT. Mr. Chairman, L. desire to make a point of

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. As the amendment now stands that the gentleman seeks to substitute his amendment for, it strikes out lines 22, 23, and 24, down to the word "naturalization," and no more. The original amendment of the gentleman from California sought to strike out the same language that the gentleman now seeks to strike out, down to and including the word

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman can do that, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. I just want to call the attention of the Chair to this proposition, that last night the committee voted to retain in the bill so far as this amendment was concerned, these lines, and I suggest to the Chair that the gentleman can not now under the guise of a substitute strike out from the bill lines which the committee has already voted to retain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman can in a substitute include those lines if he desires to do so. There can not be any question about that. And the Chair overrules the point of order, and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I stated yesterday the position I tried to occupy before the House in regard to the two bills—the Burnett bill, H. R. 6060, and House bill 102—which relates to exclusion entirely and the registration of all Asiatic laborers. There was an understanding in the committee that those should come on separate bills, which I believe should be done. The proposition of legislating on the Asiatic exclusion is now presented to the House. I want to say to the Democrats in this House that I would rather send my resignation to the Speaker and go home, than I would to go and explain to my constituents, whom I promised in writing that I would vote for the exclusion of all Asiatics, and whom I promised that I would not let such legislation lie in the pigeonhole 8 or 10 years, and pretend to do something. I promised them I would be on the job in season and out of season to obtain such legislation. All Asiatic laborers must be excluded.

In 1908 I had the pleasure of going to the Denver convention that nominated the present Secretary of State for President, and I appeared before the committee on platform and had inserted as one of the principles that we were in favor of excluding Asiatic laborers. I want to call your attention to a statement that I am going to have inserted in the RECORD. Upon one side of this card in large letters is "Wilson and the Japanese," and upon the other side is "Roosevelt and the Japanese." I am going to read to you what is on the side headed "Wilson and the Japanese" on May 3, 1912. This is quoted:

the Japanese" on May 3, 1912. This is quoted:

In the matter of Chinese and Japanese coolle immigration, I stand for the national policy of exclusion. The whole question is one of assimilation of diverse races. We can not make a homogeneous population out of a people who do not blend with the Caucasian race. Their lower standard of living as laborers will crowd out the white agriculturist and is in other fields a most serious industrial menace. The success of free Democratic institutions demands of our people education, intelligence, and patriotism, and the State should protect them against unjust and impossible competition. Remunerative labor is the basis of contentment. Democracy rests on the equality of the citizen, Oriental coolielsm will give us another race problem to solve, and surely we have had our lesson.

That is a statement that went by millions over the West, And when the question then comes up for action by my Democratic friends, I want to ask you if you are going to believe that that grand man in the White House to-day will sign or veto a bill containing Asiatic exclusion?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. RAKER. If you will give me five minutes more, I will yield.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask just one simple question. Why is it you seek to amend the Hayes amendment by striking from it all the rest except the Asiatic? Why do you not let it stand for the purity of the white race just as it is? That excludes the black as well as the yellow.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not. I have but a f

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for seven minutes. I have not taken up much of the time of the House.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether it is the intention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] to finish this bill to-day?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; I hope so. Mr. MANN. Well, if that is the case, I do not think we ought to have any 10-minute speeches.

Mr. RAKER. Give me five minutes. I have not hitherto taken up much of the time of the House.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman had 15 minutes on this proposition yesterday

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may proceed for four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes. Is there objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I object, Mr. Chairman. Mr. MANN. I shall object to any extension if there is any intention to push the bill through to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objects.

Mr. RAKER. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may put this card in the RECORD, showing the statements side by side, on one side Mr. Roosevelt on the Japanese, and on the other side Mr. Wilson on the Japanese.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington objects.

Mr. RAKER. Then I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will also put in the Record the vote cast by the people of California for Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Wilson, respectively, for President, indicating that the people of California were not opposed to Asiatic immigration, I shall not object to the publication of the card in the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will put in the RECORD the vote of Los Angeles, showing that Mr. Roosevelt did not carry California, I will do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. I reserve the right to object.
Mr. BURNETT. 'The regular order, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington ob-

Mr. BRYAN. I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Is there objection? RECORD.

Mr. BRYAN. I object to his extending his remarks along that line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington objects. Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a question of personal privilege can not arise in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will staté it.

Mr. RAKER. I simply want to ask the Chairman and the gentlemen of the House on that side and the gentlemen on this side whether or not, simply because I have a vital question to explain when I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, so that I can get into the RECORD what ought to go there, I am to be cut out and everybody else on that side allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. The House has had more patience with the gentleman from California than with any other gentleman in the

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not stated a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BURNETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment excluding Asiatics will not be adopted. I think it is no breach of confidence for me to say that the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, feels that these matters can all be settled by treaty negotiation. If not, before this session closes I believe the Committee on Immigration will report legislation which I hope will meet all the conditions there.

When Mr. Morrison, the secretary of the American Federation of Labor, was before our committee this question was asked him in regard to amending the present bill so as to exclude Asiatics:

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke about the menace of the Asiatic immigration. This bill has been pending several years before Congress. Do you think it would be expedient to incorporate that into this bill or to urge it as a separate bill?

Mr. MORRISON. You mean in regard to the Asiatics?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. Inasmuch as this bill has been through the House and the Senate and has been debated in both, I would like to see this bill go through just as it is, and I would like to see this other bill follow on its own merits. There does not seem to be much opposition to it.

Now, to show the activity of my friend from California, Judge RAKER, in contrast with that of some of the gentlemen who have been urging this amendment, I read here what the record says. This is what occurred in committee at the public hearing of Mr. Morrison, when he made the statements just quoted:

Mr. RAKER, I hope you will not commit yourself on that until you get in your mind the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Morrison proceeds:

Mr. Morrison Proceeds.

Mr. Morrison I will give you my reasons. I think this bill can go straight through and give us the relief that you will be anxious to give us in three or four months from now—very anxious, and sorry that you did not do it sconer. There is danger, in putting through the bill excluding the orientals, of diplomatic relations as between England and the United States.

That shows, Mr. Chairman, that the man fresh from Seattle, fresh from the meeting of the labor people of the country, himself concurred in our views to regard to that Asiatic question.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that none of my friends from the South will be swept off their feet by the provision in regard to excluding Africans. There were only 6,000 of them who came last year, and 1.600 of them came to the East Coast Railroad in Florida, and more than 800 went back. Most of the others went to the States of the North. Not a single one went to Louisiana, only two or three went to Mississippi; and when there is so much involved in this bill, when there is so much at stake, when the head of the State Department himself has expressed his desire that this question should be separated from the bill that is now under consideration, I hope that none of my friends from the Southern States will be swept away by reason of the fact that this amendment would exclude Africans, when scarcely any of them are coming to this country : all, except those that have come to the Panama Canal and those that came to the East Coast Railroad and have returned, and when none of them are coming to the South. I am reminded by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that most of those who do come go up into his part of the country.

Now, if the gentlemen who propose this amendment had been so earnestly desiring this legislation, why is it that when the Dillingham bill was pending in the Senate the Senators from California did not undertake to incorporate this amendment on that bill? Why is it that the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] for 12 years has never, when his own party was in power, got any such regulation as this put through, but now comes in with this amendment? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen, it is unjust and unfair, and I appeal to my colleagues from the South not to be swept off their feet by such argument, when it does not affect our country at all. [Applause and cries of "Vote."]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be drawn into a personal controversy on this great proposition, but I can not let such words as have been said on this floor this morning pass without denial.

Practically the only speeches that have been made on this floor until the last session or two in favor of the exclusion of all Asiatics from this country have been made by myself, and I have made a speech of that kind in almost every session that that when great hordes of negroes were being imported to the

I have been a Member of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.] I introduced a bill on the first day of this session along the same lines as the amendment which I proposed yesterday. Now, I have no pride of authorship, and, so far from playing politics in this matter, if I thought there was any opportunity for affirmative legislation of this kind in this Congress, I would be very glad to sink myself entirely in this matter and take any proposition from the other side of the House that might be offered that would accomplish the purpose which my people desire to have accomplished. But no such proposition looked probable to me.

The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] last night said things on this floor that were entirely out of order; but I think, since he has said them, it is in order for me to say that not a line of the Raker bill has ever been read before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and nobody has made any proposition, so far as I know, to put that bill as an amendment onto this one. One provision in it was proposed as an amendment to the present bill, and I backed up the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] with as much force as I had to include that in this bill. Now, if this amendment which is now offered as a substitute was properly worded, and if it covered the men-ace that affects our people, I should have no serious opposition to it; but it does not.

As it is worded it would exclude all natives of Asia and all natives of Australia, because Australia is east of the line which the amendment proposes to make. It would exclude all Australians, and I am not sure but all Europeans, whether they were white, black, or other color. It would exclude them as Asiatic laborers, if they were laborers. I am sure this House does not want to go on record for any such indefinite, foolish proposition as that; and I say to you now if the amendment is properly worded and then offered by the other side of the House I shall support it, notwithstanding what has been said by gentlemen on the other side of the House about myself playing politics. I shall support any reasonable exclusion provision always, because since I have been here I have been active and urgent and constantly desirous that legislation of this kind might be made a part of the law of this country. I still desire to see this legislation enacted, and when I saw that there was no probability that any legislation of this kind would be offered at this session of Congress-and I still think there is no probability of it-I made the only effort that could be made and the only effort that I have had the opportunity to make since I have been a Member of this House to get legislation of this kind before the House.

When practically this same bill was before the House in the last Congress there was no opportunity to make an amendment It would not have been in order. You remember that the bill passed the Senate first; it came to the House, was referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and that committee substituted for it the illiteracy test, and only that, and only amendments affecting that test were in order before the House. When it came back from the Senate under the report of the conferees there was no opportunity of making such an amendment as I have offered. I say this in justice to myself.

I hope the House will vote down the imperfect provision embodied in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and will incorporate the amendment I have offered as amended by the gentleman from Wisconsin, which will accomplish what the people of the Pacific coast and, I believe, of the whole country are asking for—the exclusion of the laborers from all parts of Asia. Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I have not injected my remarks into this discussion, not because of any lack of interest that I had in this particular piece of legislation, but because I have been so anxious that the bill should pass at the earliest possible moment that I thought it was best to say nothing.

But in my opinion the crisis of this bill has now been reached. If either of these amendments is incorporated into this bill, this legislation that this committee have so ably and persistently fought for, and so many of us have tried to assist in passing, will fail to become a law. I have noticed since this proposition has been advanced that those who are most anxious to incorporate it in the bill are those who have opposed most strenuously this legislation from the beginning. And when the roll is called I predict that those gentlemen who have waged the fight against it will be found voting for the amendments.

I come from a State where nearly half a million more negroes reside than white people, but you can not get my vote for these amendments by offering any such sop as you put in this amendment. [Applause.] I do not say that you are insincere in offering to exclude negroes by your amendment, but I do say. South, when we needed your assistance, you did not then rise up and say you did not want them admitted, nor did you offer unto us any aid in solving the problem. You have inserted the negro in your amendment for no other purpose than that you think it will draw support from southern Members. If you really are interested in our welfare, if you want to help us, why do not you assist us to repeal the fifteenth and modify the fourteenth amendments, and pass some Jim Crow car laws and segregation laws for the District of Columbia? We do not have to worry about the number of negroes that are now being imported into the South. There are none. But the thing that interests us most now is how to deal with those we already have. I am in sympathy with the sentiments expressed in your amendments, and I would be as glad as any man on the floor of this House to see such a bill reported out of the committee and enacted into law, but I remember the admonition, "Beware of Greeks bringing gifts." This bill should not be embarrassed by these amendments.

Gentlemen, if you incorporate in this bill either of them you present a very acute situation in international affairs in this The great President of the United States and his most efficient Secretary, Mr. Bryan, are now doing everything in their power to adjust and settle the very delicate Japanese question, and in my opinion they will eventually succeed. But whenever you incorporate in this bill this amendment you not only fan the flames of discord, passion, and prejudice in the breasts of those people, but you wipe out and destroy any possible chance for an amicable solution of the question, and you Democrats will thereby only embarrass your own President and administration. But aside from this you do another thing, you present a bill to the Senate that it will not pass, and if it does pass such a bill the President will veto it.

I ask you, my colleagues from the South, who have fought so valiantly to restrict undesirable immigration—and I want to say that there is no more ardent Member for the restriction of undesirable immigration in the House than I am-I beg you not to vote for this amendment and so hamper the bill that it will never become a law. This is the best bill for the restriction of undesirable immigration that has ever been before this House. Let us stand by the committee; let us stand by the 'administration; let us pass this bill in its original form, unhampered by amendments that the opponents of the bill are trying so adroitly to load it down with. [Applause.] No good piece of legislation has ever been before this House that its opponents did not apparently try to help, yet designedly to destroy by loading it down with amendments, the weight of which would necessarily kill it. It was done when we tried to pass a bill destroying gambling in cotton futures; when we passed the currency bill, the tariff bill, and the Webb liquor bill. You can not fool the people back home. They know who are their friends, and they will know that their friends and the friends of this measure are not going to play politics with them by voting for these amendments and thereby destroy the them by voting for these amendments and thereby destroy the them by voting for these amendments and thereby destroy the now very excellent chance of passing this legislation.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the Japanese-American war is now being fought principally in the headlines of the California newspapers, and I regret to say even in this presence of 400 Representatives, presumably the greatest deliberative body in the world, that we have not the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Capt. Hobson, to advise us. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Ought we not to postpone it?

Mr. MOORE. What transpired here yesterday in regard to these amendments is what has been transpiring in the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization for seven years. has not been wholly with the Republican administration nor wholly with the Democratic administration. There has been a desire on the part of conservative men to try this question conservatively, but the gentleman from California would not down, and since the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has arrived in Congress the agitation has been worse than it ever was before, and the headlines in the California newspapers have been more startling than they were in the best old Republican

This illustrates just what a deliberative body will do when the newspapers get behind Members and press them forward to do something that is ill-considered and ill-advised. Your Secretary of State to-day is not in favor of passing an anti-Japanese law. Will you take that from me? [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Then you take it from him when he speaks, as he will, or has done already.

But your Secretary of State is not only opposed to the introduction into this immigration bill of this Asiatic question— I will go further and venture the prediction; I will even make the assertion-that your Secretary of State is opposed to the Raker bill and does not want to have it passed by this House. Your Secretary of State has some regard for agreements made with foreign nations, and he wants to live up to those agreements or he wants to get away from those agreements in an honorable way [applause], and to his credit let it be said that for the present, despite the attacks made upon him, he does not want to declare this war at the instance of the newspapers in California, but he wants to have it reasoned out in Congress in a deliberative way.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly.

Mr. HAYES. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks the amendment as proposed by me and amended by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] violates any treaty or agreement of this country?

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman's amendment would provoke a great deal of discussion and misunderstanding on the part of Japan and would embarrass the present Secretary of State in the negotiations that are now pending. [Ap-

Mr. HAYES. Does the gentleman think it violates any

Mr. MOORE. And the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. Raker] is still worse.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, the Hayes amendment, as modified by the Learoot amendment, does not interfere with existing passport arrangements, but does interfere with existing treaties.

Mr. HAYES. Which one?

Mr. GARDNER. Any treaty, for instance, which contains the most-favored-nation clause as regards travel.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MANN.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the bill itself do that?
Mr. GARDNER. The bill itself does it as well. The bill itself contains language which was held up by the State Department last year and submitted to the representatives of foreign governments, and by them approved.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there? To what Government was it referred?

Mr. GARDNER. I understand that it was referred to the Japanese

Mr. RAKER. Are we to legislate what the Mikado tells us to do?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, well, will the gentleman please let me go ahead? Mr. Chairman, suppose this amendment be adopted, or the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], or even stronger amendments, or suppose we exclude every yellow man or brown man or black man that anybody suggests, let us see how much it would all amount to? There came into this country last year from India 179 Hindus. There came into this country 6,634 Africans, of whom 1,100 went to my State of Massachusetts. Twenty-five hundred went to New York, and scarcely any went to any southern State, except the State of Florida where some went to labor temporarily on the East Coast Railway.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. GARDNER. Yes. Mr. BARTLETT. Not a one of those went to Georgia? Mr. GARDNER. Not a single one went to the gentleman's

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. For a question.

Will the gentleman state Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. whether or not he believes the 1,100 Africans whom he mentions as having gone to the State of Massachusetts should have been permitted to come in or should have been entirely excluded?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, I think they ought to have been permitted to come in if they could read and write. Mr. Chairman, 8,281 Japanese came to this country. Let us see where they went. Of that number 5,358 came to the American mainland, mostly as visitors, I fancy, for I see that 5,437 Japanese left the American mainland last year on their way home. Three thousand two hundred and thirty-one Japanese came to Hawaii, while 2,593 went back to Japan from Hawaii. Were many of them laborers? Very few. Four hundred and twenty-five farm laborers went from Japan to Hawaii and 185 of them went away. again. Two hundred and eighty-five ordinary laborers came to Hawaii and 1,325 ordinary laborers left Hawaii.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Did the number of Africans include those colored races that came from the Barbados and British possessions?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes. Two-thirds of the African immigrants came from the West Indies. When we consider that the immigration into this country amounts to nearly a million and a half in one year, it is foolish to worry over the few thousand yellow men and brown men and black men whom you might exclude by these amendments. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I can not quite appreciate the reasoning of my distinguished friend from Alabama in charge of the bill, who says that the adoption of this amendment is not necessary, because the committee will report a separate bill which may pass, and we ought not to adopt it on this bill because if it is, then this bill will be killed because of the amendment. [Applause.] It seems to me that is slightly illogical. Nor do I believe that the amendments have been offered here for the purpose of playing politics. The gentlemen who have offered the amendments are friends of the bill and have long been friends of this proposition.

Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to vote for this bill [applause], and if the adopting of the amendments were sure to defeat the bill, then I should vote for the amendments with some compunctions of conscience. But, Mr. Chairman, I have been long enough in this House, I hope, to place the country above the party. I do not believe that any of these amendments should be agreed to at this time. [Applause.] Dealing with our for-eign relations is a matter of delicacy at the best. While I do not have the greatest pride in the present State Department, yet I feel that in conducting our relations with foreign countries I am bound to rely in the first instance at least upon the State Department. If they can not eradicate the difficulties of the situation through diplomatic negotiations, it is time enough then for the Congress to act by specific legislation. I am not prepared to invite war with Japan or any other country, though if war should come as a result of any legislation I would not shrink from it. I think now is the time for us to be cool and collected, not to be carried off our feet because we think perchance we can play politics at the advantage of the Democratic side of the House. We owe an allegiance to our country above our party. [Applause.]
Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. HAYES. I trust the gentleman will acquit me of any desire to play politics in any part I take in this legislation.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] is a sincere advocate of this proposition, and I think perchance would be subject to criticism if he had not offered this amend-He, standing as he is an advocate on one side, is properly doing what he believes is right, and he is more or less prejudiced. We represent the entire country, and we ought to protect at this time even California against herself. [Applause, and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is exhausted on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that debate on this amendment is exhausted. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Sher-LEY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose when the gentleman from Kentucky has concluded.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask to speak for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Only one unanimous-consent request can be recognized at a time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, much that I would wish to say has been well said by the leader of the minority, and in his speech he showed himself to be worthily the leader of a great party [applause], because there are times in the consideration of questions when partyism becomes subservient to patriotism. I am also opposed to this bill. I would do everything I properly could to prevent it becoming a law, but I am not willing to do anything to prevent it becoming a law that may be of direct injury and great moment to my country. the time comes in America when it is necessary for this House to speak in plain terms upon this question of Asiatic immigration, I have no doubt what will be the verdict of the House, and I clearly have no doubt as to what will be my own position, but I a thing may be right and yet the time and the means of accomplishing it may be entirely wrong. There is no situation to-day confronting the people of America that warrants the adoption of the proposals offered by any of the gentlemen from California. There is no reason why we should deny our belief in the present administration and in the ability of the President of the United States through the proper channels to meet all the conditions that now confront the people of America.

And to inject at this time and in this way this matter is of necessity to make more difficult his very serious duty, that he will ably and successfully perform if given the confidence of the people of the country and of their Representatives in Congress. And I can not believe that there is a Democrat on this floor who has so little faith in the wisdom of the Executive and his ability through the proper diplomatic channels to handle this situation, as to want to force an issue upon us by the adoption of these proposals. Let men differ as they please about the great fundamental question of immigration that we are considering in this bill, but let them not drag into it a matter that is now receiving the diplomatic attention of our own and of foreign countries.

I am not a man who is fearful of America's position and ability to maintain itself against the world. I am one of those who believe in my country and in her possibilities, but I am also one of those who would be the last to provoke a situation that might require a resort to force rather than to the peaceful solution of a question; and I can only repeat that in the consideration of this matter let us remember that we speak for America, not for any section of America, and that we speak not for a party, but for all the people of America. [Applause,]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to be heard for two minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky object?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; I do not object.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, as you know, I always have been opposed to the section of this bill which provides for a literacy test, and I am of the firm opinion that the adoption of such a test would be a grievous mistake. Nothing can convince me that our party and the people of this country would approve of the enactment of a law which is so manifestly unjust. Some of my friends are under the impression that by adopting this amendment offered by my friend from California [Mr. HAYES] and amended by my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. RAKER] there will be a better chance to defeat the final passage of the bill. They maintain that if this amendment is adopted the President of the United States will be compelled to veto the bill. My opinion, Mr. Chairman, is that the bill now contains enough obnoxious provisions—the most objectionable one, of course, being the one calling for a literacy testto justify him in vetoing it, and I for one do not believe that to gain a slight advantage we should inject into this bill any matter which might place our President or our country in an embarrassing position.

Furthermore, I feel that, even should we adopt this amendment, it would promptly be stricken out in the Senate, and I am sure the bill would never contain this provision when placed before the President, consequently I can see nothing to be gained by its adoption.

I can readily understand why the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] and my colleague on the committee [Mr. RAKER] should seek to secure the passage of some measure which would restrict Asiatic immigration, for I am thoroughly in sympathy with their views on that question, but I believe it would be both unwise and unfair to load down the pending measure with a restrictive provision of this kind. Therefore I believe that the amendment, as well as the substitute offered by my colleague [Mr. RAKER], should be defeated.

Before I conclude I wish to say that for years both of these gentlemen from California have been doing everything within their power to bring about the restriction of Asiatic immigration, and I hope that none of the residents of their respective districts will charge them with not having done their utmost to bring about the legislation for which they are contending to-day.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in conclusion I wish to state that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the gentlemen from Alabama and Tennessee do our side an injustice when they state that all of us who are opposed to the bill are going to vote for these amendments. We are fighting an honest fight, and we do not propose to employ any unfair tactics in our effort to defeat the bill, nor do we propose to adopt an amendment without any thought of the consequences, and merely for the purpose of securing a slight advantage over those who favor the passage of this bill. We are fighting for what we believe is right and just, and we are as much entitled to voice the sentiments of the people whom we represent and in whom we have the utmost confidence as are the gentlemen from Mississippi or from Alabama to speak for those whose views they ex-

As for myself, I wish to assure these gentlemen that I shall continue to oppose this un-American and unjustifiable measure with all of the strength that I possess, but I am not willing to cast my vote for any proposition that may in the slightest degree endanger our peaceful relations with any country, no matter how desirous I am of defeating the bill. Although my sympathies go out to these thousands and thousands of unfortunates who, through no fault of theirs, will be barred from entering our country if this bill becomes a law, I am still more solicitous of the welfare of my country, for I place that above everything else.

rerything else. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman—
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I give notice that after this

I shall object to any further time.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, is this being taken out of my

The gentleman from California [Mr. The CHAIRMAN.

CHURCH] is recognized.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California, my colleague Mr. RAKER, was reading a certain card while he was speaking a few moments ago on which was quoted on one side the opinion of Mr. Wilson, the President of the United States, in regard to Asiatic exclusion, and on the other side what Mr. Roosevelt, a former President of the United States, said upon the same subject.

He read only what was on one side of the card. That is, his time did not permit him to read but one side of the card; therefore he read only what Mr. Wilson had said. I rise to read the other side of the card, so that we may know also what Mr. Roosevelt said upon this important subject. Here is the extract.

In his message to the Fifty-ninth Congress:

I recommend to the Congress that an act be passed specifically providing for the naturalization of Japanese who come here intending to become American citizens.

In the moment that I have left I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of excluding the Asiatics. Coming from California, as I do, I could not, with the experience I have had, with the observation I have made, entertain any other opinion than what I do on this subject. I do not know for sure that it is proper to bring this amendment in at the present time and attach it to this bill. We should act wisely and carefully. I shall, however, vote for the amendment which my colleague, Mr. RAKER, has introduced.

The Asiatic and Japanese problem is one of profound importance to the United States, and especially so to the State of California, and without doubt something must be done and done soon to prevent the immigration of these people. As for the Japanese, he is only satisfied with the best, and has located upon and now owns much of the best land in the State of California. Probably the richest section in the State is located between Stockton and Antioch on the Sacramento River. At a point in this section of the country one can look for miles in every direction and see nothing but the gardens and farms operated and controlled by the Japs, and if immigration is not restricted in time my native State, California, will become a Japanese colony.

We have another western plague—the Hindus—more threat-ening even than the Japs. These strange fellows are landing by the thousands upon the Pacific coast. Every dollar they get is sent back to their native land with which to pay the passage to this country of their uncles and cousins, and the worst feature of the situation is they seem to be all related, and millions of them are planning to come. They can never be assimilated in this country, and we are glad of it. They de-grade the very earth on which they walk. They are as tough as whalebone and can live as cheaply as a wild goose. Their clothing and food, as much as possible, come from their own Their country. They pride themselves on being odd. Twisted around and around their heads is a strip of calico 10 or 12 feet in length, which they call a turban. They are human scarecrows; can be seen on our public highways by hundreds every hour of the day and night, and are so peculiar in language and in dress that even the farmer's horse refuses to pass them on the public highways. highway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Lang-LEY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, would like to be recognized for three minutes after the gentleman from Kentucky has finished.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he settle that with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]. The gentleman should not object to this request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Lang-

LEY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Hayes]that is, I am opposed to ingrafting it on this bill-for two In the first place, those who are in a position to know, and in whose judgment I have the utmost confidence, say that the adoption of such an amendment will probably defeat the bill, and being anxious to see it enacted into law, and as speedily as possible, I shall vote against the amendment, although I am in favor of the purpose which the gentleman is seeking to accomplish and I would heartly support it as a separate proposition. I shall vote against it for the further reason that those who are in the confidence of the administration say that the adoption of such an amendment would embarrass the efforts that it is making for an amicable and honorable settlement of a perplexing international question. I am in hearty accord with the sentiments just expressed by the distinguished leader of the minority.

It is true that I belong to a political party not in sympathy with the domestic policies of the present administration, but, as the distinguished Secretary of the Navy recently said, it is the duty of every American citizen, regardless of politics, to sustain the head of our own Nation in any controversy with a foreign power. This is not a political duty, but a patriotic Woodrow Wilson is a Democrat, but he is the President of all the people now, and William Jennings Bryan is the Secretary of State of all the people now, and we must assume that in dealing with this question they are actuated by the highest and most patriotic motives, and that they will handle it in a manner befitting the dignity, honor, and prestige of our Nation; and so long as they do, no partisan motive or advantage should be permitted to swerve us in the slightest from our duty to our country. [Applause.]

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, I can not permit the opportunity to pass of saying that I for one am growing weary of side-stepping the Japanese question. I do not close my eyes to the ever darkening shadow of this Asiatic peril. I do not mean the shadow of grim-visaged war, for I think that phase of the situation is much exaggerated. I mean rather the menace of the industrial war which, unless we take steps to prevent it, is inevitable as a result of the industrial awakening among the teeming millions in the Orient who are responding with alarming rapidity to the touch of the spirit of this progressive age. I hope the promise given here to-day by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnerr] and others, that a separate measure dealing with this question will be brought before us at an early date, will be faithfully kept; and when it is, I hope to have the privilege of discussing it further. I do not know how other gentlemen may feel about it, but, speaking for myself alone, I do not think we have anything to fear about a war with Japan. Gentlemen who are alarmed on that question should remember that Japan is in no financial condition for such a conflict, and that we have a much more powerful Navy and many more people. Therefore they apply there are the coppe with my airlors upon Therefore they could not hope to cope with us either upon the sea or upon the land. I do not think there is the slightest danger of them sending an army of invasion into the United States; but if they should, and if the line of march should happen to extend through Kentucky, I think I can safely promise you that the army will never get any nearer to Washington, [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] has asked unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, we occasionally reach a period in the history of the House of Representatives when all of us can stand upon the same platform. We reach a time when patriotism ought always to rise above questions of party expediency. I congratulate the minority in this House upon the patriotic position taken by the leader of the minority [Mr. Mann].

During the Taft administration the thing that attracted most commendation from Democrats and from Republicans alike was the successful efforts of Mr. Taft and his advisers to avoid complications with the island Empire across the seas. Those difficulties increased as his administration drew to a close, and we inherited those problems. Among the things the present administration is entitled to credit for and is receiving credit for are, first of all, the fact that so far we have avoided a war with Mexico and the fact that so far we have avoided a war with Japan.

I appeal to the Democrats on this side, if they prefer to follow a Republican leader upon this question, to follow the real leader upon the Republican side. The school question-the acute Japanese question-arose during the latter half of Mr. Taft's administration, and during that time the gentleman from California [Mr. Hayes] was a tower of strength for the Republican administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. He did not open his head in this House upon any of those questions then.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to give notice that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good] wants three minutes, and another gentleman wants probably five minutes, and after that I shall object to the extension of this debate.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good] asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I object.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSI. I object.
Mr. MONDELL rose.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island objects.
Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the substitute.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good] is recognized on the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. CARDNER Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a motion to strike out the last word is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has moved to strike out the last word of the substitute, which motion is in order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, but I am opposed to this substitute and the amendment. I am opposed to them because I believe their adoption will defeat The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] read what purported to be the statements of the President of the United States as favoring the exclusion of Asiatic immigration. There is another side to that story. In the History of the American People, by Woodrow Wilson, written when he was not a candidate for the Presidency, I find these most significant words:

Now, there came multitudes of men of the lowest class from the south of Italy and men of the meaner sort out of Hungary and Poland, men out of the ranks where there was neither skill nor energy nor any initiative of quick intelligence; and they came in numbers which increased from year to year, as if the countries of the south of Europe were disburdening themselves of the more sordid and hapless elements of their population, the men whose standards of life and of work were such as American workmen had never dreamed of hitherto. The people of the Pacific coast had clamored these many years against the admission of immigrants out of China, and in May, 1892, got at last what they wanted, a Federal statute which practically excluded from the United States all Chinese who had not already acquired the right of residence; and yet the Chinese were more to be desired, as workmen if not as citizens, than most of the coarse crew that came crowding in every year at the eastern ports. They had, no doubt, many an unsavory habit, bred unwholesome squalor in the crowded quarters where they most abounded in the western seaports, and seemed separated by their very nature from the people among whom they had come to live; but it was their skill, their intelligence, their hardy power of labor, their knack at succeeding and driving duller rivals out, rather than their alien habits, that made them feared and hated and led to their exclusion at the prayer of the men they were likely to displace should they multiply. The unlikely fellows who came in at the eastern ports were tolerated because they usurped no place but the very lowest in the scale of labor.

I might read more that would inform the gentleman from

I might read more that would inform the gentleman from California that if he ever hopes, while Woodrow Wilson is President of the United States, to secure an Asiatic exclusion law, it must be by passing the bill over the veto of the President of the United States. I am amazed at the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who claims to be for this bill, and who is a member of the committee that reported the bill, that he should now inject into this debate an amendment which he knows, if he has read the statement of President Wilson, would bring about the defeat of the bill by a veto from the President.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we ought to rise above these considerations. We ought to look this situation squarely and fairly in the face. It is true it would embarrass the President and the State Department, but it would do more than that; its passage would defeat the very bill that the gentleman from California [Mr. Raker] favors. For these reasons I am opposed to the substitute and to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that in the midst of the oratory to which we have been listening in the last 30 minutes we have lost sight of just what is before the House. If gentlemen will turn to page 4 of the bill, at the beginning of section 3 they will find these words:

And the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States.

And then if they will turn to the part of the bill which it is proposed to amend they will find that the language which it is proposed to strike out is as follows:

Persons who can not become eligible under existing law to become citizens of the United States by naturalization.

Who are the people who can not under existing law become citizens by naturalization? Malays, Chinese, Japanese Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield in the brief time I have.
Mr. RAKER. The courts—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. At least that is what we understand to be the attitude of the courts with regard to the matter of naturalization. That is what the committee meant from Caliwrote that language into the bill. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] now proposes to declare definitely what the bill proposes in questionable language. Is there any condition in the country which ought to prevent or persuade us from saying clearly what is a fair interpretation of the language of the bill? That is the question before the House. Are our foreign relations so acute and so liable to bring us into trouble with our foreign neighbors that we can not write into the bill in unmistakable language the courts' interpretation of the language of the bill as it stands? The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] proposes an amendment which is not at all to the point, because it would exclude men geographically and not racially. It would exclude a white man native of Australia or a white man from anywhere east of the line his amendment describes. What we desire is not to exclude men by reason of their geographical location, but to exclude certain races. I am for this bill. I hope to see it pass, and I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], because I believe in making clear every proposition contained in a legislative enactment.

That is all that the amendment does. Gentlemen appeal to us in the name of patriotism and attempt to veil and make uncertain what, as a matter of fact, is the intent of the legislation. one am in favor of making the declaration clear and unmistakable. [Applause.] I have said that the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. Hayes], excluding specifically "Hindus and all persons of the Mongolian or yellow race, the Malay or brown race, and the African or black race," was but stating in clear and definite language what the provision now in the bill excluding persons ineligible for naturalization is intended to cover; that is an accurate statement, barring for some difference of opinion as to Hindus, except for the fact that the Hayes amendment will also exclude people of African blood, who are not excluded by the language in the bill, because they are eligible to citizenship. Further than making our meaning clear and unmistakable and not leaving it to court decisions to determine what we mean the Hayes amendment, except for some doubt as to Hindus, simply adds the African to the other excluded races. Are the gentlemen from the South willing to take the position that they want to exclude the Chinese and Japanese and do not want to exclude the African? Being in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, as I am in favor of the bill as a whole, I shall not be dissuaded from voting for it on the theory that if it remained in the bill the bill would be vetoed. That is the President's responsibility. My responsibility is here and now. Neither shall I be turned aside by the illogical suggestion that our relations with Japan will become strained and critical if we declare in plain language our purpose and intent. We do not desire Mongolian immigration from either China or Japan. No one can be offended if we say it plainly rather than attempt to hide behind court decisions as to eligibility to citizenship. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER) there were 6 ayes and 182 noes.

So the substitute was lost.
The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] as amended by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer. Mr. GARDNER. I make the point of order that it is not admissible; that it is an amendment in the third degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman can offer an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the amendment as amended the words "the African or black race."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is an amendment in the third degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. Hayes] as amended by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Hayes, Mr. J. I. Nolan, and Mr. Raker) there were 54 ayes and 203 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. MOORE. Is the literacy-test paragraph still open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. MOORE. I desire to offer an amendment. I want to say that there are several amendments, of which this is one, which will be offered to perfect the bill, and I want to know if they are debatable under the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. It depends upon what part of the bill they are offered to.

Mr. MOORE. This refers to the literacy paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate upon that is admissible, for debate has been closed. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 19, after the word "all," insert "male."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 9, strike out the word "may" and insert the word must."

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, lines 15, 16, and 17, strike out all after the word "case" down to and including the word "clapsed."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that can be debated. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a ruling of the Chair whether that is debatable or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is debatable.
Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed and debate the amendment I desire to offer an amendment to the literacy-

Mr. MOORE. Then I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. SABATH. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 16, strike out all after the words "to wit" down to and including the word "persecution," in line 20, page 8, and insert the following:

"All aliens who shall prove to the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious or political persecution, whether evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory or oppressive laws or regulations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SABATH) there were 47 ayes and 63 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, line 19, after the word "States," strike out the word

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 15, after the semicolon after the word "case," strike out the remainder of the proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the provise to which this amendment is proposed seeks to limit the introduction of skilled labor into this country. I raise no objection to that addition to existing law contained in lines 9 to 15, namely, that the question as to whether there is any skilled labor in this country of a particular kind, before such skilled labor can be admitted into this country, must be passed on by the Secretary of Labor, and that his determination of the question will be final, subject, however, to an appeal to which $\hat{\mathbf{I}}$ protest. Here is the provision contained in the latter part of the proviso that the amendment seeks to strike out, which seeks first to hold that decision in abeyance for 30 days, and further to publish that decision in three newspapers throughout the country and to allow any person who feels dissatisfied—that is the word used in the bill—to enter the United States district court and there-upon the decision is held up and nothing can be done in the matter as to the admission of the skilled labor, if the Secretary has decided there is no similar labor available, until the decision of the district court.

Mr. Chairman, during the time when I was out of Congress ' I had occasion to have this matter presented to me in a case directly in point, where there was no skilled labor in the country to perform a particular character of work. What will the manufacturers do who are about to inaugurate a new industry, and need skilled labor which is not available here, if this provision is carried as recommended by the committee? At the present time the Bethlehem Steel Co., at Bethlehem, Pa., as I am informed, is installing a Girod electric furnace of 10 tons capacity. There are no operatives in this country whatsoever who have the expert knowledge needed to operate that furnace. In the steel industry throughout this country we are very much behind European manufacturers so far as electrical furnaces are concerned. The Kjellin furnace, which is in operation in Sweden and other foreign countries, the Héroult, and the Rodenhauser furnaces are being introduced into this country, but they need skilled workmen to install and operate them. operation of this bill, what is going to be the effect?

The Bethlehem Steel Co. will go to the Secretary of Labor and present its case. He will undoubtedly grant the right of these skilled laborers to come into the country; but then if any workman, no matter whether he is skilled or not, any outsider, sees fit to go into the district court and object to the decision and ruling of the Secretary of Labor as to the admission of that skilled labor, the plant of the steel industry will have to lie idle until that decision is made. I am not surprised that the agrarians of the South, represented so ably by the distinguished chairman of the committee, and assisted so nobly by the gentle-man from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner], are in favor of the restriction and oppression of our industries in this country from further growth and expansion where there is no skilled labor to inaugurate new processes of production or to establish new industries.

Anyone familiar with the development of industrial life in this country, with the development of the great textile industry in Philadelphia, and many other industries, will know that they had their rise because of the importation of skilled labor, which it was not possible to obtain at that time in this country. Only a few years ago we passed a provision in the tariff bill permitting the introduction of lace machinery, and 100 or more operatives came over here under the present existing law, without this arbitrary restrictive clause, and to-day the lace industry is an established industry in this country. I ask you, are you in favor of that restrictive policy? I am surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts, coming here so recently from a swing around the circle in Massachusetts, would favor such a repressive policy to American industry or lend his influence to a provision that is against the expansion and development of American industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gard-NERl is recognized.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then let the gentleman get me more time. Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman

Mr. Chairman, I have been recognized, as Mr. GARDNER. I understand, and the gentleman can ask the question in my me. I will yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. GARNER. I am surprised at the gentleman saying that the steel industry in this country is not equal in efficiency to any steel industry in the world. Mr. STAFFORD. It is not, so far as the electrical furnaces are concerned.

Mr. GARNER. The hearings before the Ways and Means Committee indicated that the steel industry was in as great a state of efficiency as any steel industry.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will investigate this phase of steel production, he will find that we are still behind in the manufacture of steel by electric furnaces. The Bethle-hem Co. is at present installing a 10-ton Girod furnace, and it requires skilled operatives who are not to be found in this country. We have not any electrical furnaces in this country as compared with those in France, Germany, Austria, Sweden—
Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield

further.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I supposed I had been yielded two minutes extra time.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had The CHAIRMAN.

yielded the gentleman one minute of his time.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, there is no need confusing the minds of members of this committee as to this question. Here is the whole sum and substance of it. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] is adopted, it will leave the bill, so far as this particular question is concerned, in exactly the state it was in when it went to conference last year. What the gentleman proposes to strike out is the La Follette amendment, prepared by the Senator from his own State and adopted last year in conference at the Senator's suggestion. Let me explain. At present, under the law, if you are a manufacturer and if in this country skilled labor of the kind you want can not be found, you have the right to import the requisite number of workmen without being guilty of violating the contract-labor law. Theoretically, at all events, that is the case, but, in practice, manufacturers are timid about availing themselves of the statute lest the immigration authorities should exclude the workmen on arrival, and lest they themselves should be punished on the ground that there was in fact no scarcity of the particular kind of skilled labor which they had imported. Two or three years ago the Department of Commerce and Labor suggested that the law should be changed so that the question as to the scarcity in this country of any particular kind of labor might be determined beforehand; that is to say, before any contract was made on the other side of the ocean. In the immigration bill which President Taft vetoed Mr. STAFFORD. And proposed to strike out—
Mr. GARDNER. When the bill was in conference the representative of the American Federation of Labor raised some question as to whether or not this new provision was sufficiently safeguarded. Senator LA FOLLETTE thought it was not sufficiently safeguarded, and he proposed that any decision of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor as to the scarcity of any particular class of labor should be subject to an appeal to the

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GARDNER. First let me get through with my statement. Senator La Follette proposed that there should be a court review on the appeal of any party interested and the conferees accepted his amendment. It is this amendment which the gentleman proposes to strike out.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether or not we were wise to insert this clause. The Secretary of Labor has sent a com-munication to this House in which he suggests that the amendment be made which is proposed by the gentleman from Wis-consin [Mr. Stafford], but the Secretary's communication reached this House only yesterday. We have had no committee meeting to consider it. The language which this amendment seeks to strike out was adopted last year after consultation with the representatives of the American Federation of Labor and with Senator La Follette. If we made a mistake it can easily be remedied in the Senate. I am unwilling to vote to strike out this language until we have had either a committee meeting or hearings, or a further opportunity to examine the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. You have the indorsement of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. GARDNER. You mean that he has suggested that the appeal paragraph be struck out. I explained that fact.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, though I am in favor of liberal immigration, I am opposed to any contract labor being imported into this country, as well as being opposed to any and all stimulated immigration; but I am under the impression that the bill as drafted is unnecessarily harsh in its provisions, and that not only will it give to the Secretary of Labor the power that he desires, but it will confer upon him more power than he ever dreamed of possessing. In other words—

Mr. GARDNER. Was not the gentleman one of those who in conference last year was in favor of putting in this very proposition that is now being asked to be stricken out?

Mr. SABATH. I did favor an amendment somewhat similar in character, but I was not then and am not now in favor of any amendment that would give to anyone the authority to practically imprison an alien for 30 days until his case has been passed upon by the department. I think the section or paragraph should be so amended as to remove the possibility of these aliens being compelled to remain in custody and undergo the hardships which they would undoubtedly be subjected to in the event that an appeal was taken from the decision of the Secretary and they had to await the decision of the court.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. He could not possibly be held in any way.

Lines 12 and 13 say:

Such application to be made before such importation.

They must be on the other side of the ocean.

Mr. SABATH. But such determination shall not become final until a period of 30 days has elapsed.

Mr. GARDNER. Exactly.
Mr. SABATH. Now, we will say the Secretary has ruled favorably on the application and the people have sailed. They arrive, say, at the port of New York or Boston. Meanwhile some one has filed an objection under the provision on page 9, line 22, which says:

At any time during said period of 30 days any person dissatisfied with the ruling may appeal to the district court of the United States of the district into which the labor is sought to be brought, which court or the judge thereof in vacation shall have jurisdiction to try de novo such question of necessity, and the decision in such court shall be final

Mr. GARDNER. Now will the gentleman yield? Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman suppose that any employer, in view of the tremendous penalties for importing contract labor, will import those men on a temporary decision of the Secretary of Labor, and which he knows to be temporary when he is faced with the tremendous penalty which he would incur if the reviewing court decided against him?

Mr. SABATH. I hope that they will not. But I am not willing to enact legislation whereby a man, who is not guilty of any offense, can be virtually imprisoned for 30 days. As I have stated before, I am in favor of stopping all importation of contract labor. Also, as I remarked a short while ago, I am opposed to any provision that will aid or assist such importation, but if you do permit the importation of skilled labor, as I believe you will, I am not willing to have these mechanics and skilled laborers subjected to such treatment as the bill row provides for. I shall vigorously oppose the enactment of legislation which will authorize the confinement of these men for a period of approximately 30 days after the Secretary of Labor has handed down an opinion, and which at the same time will authorize their confinement for an indefinite period while the courts are passing upon the decision of the Secretary, in the event that some one enters an objection to their admission.

It is, indeed, strange that you gentlemen should be so anxious for restriction, and yet apparently be so deeply interested in the importation of labor. How can you justify your actions? If you are so opposed to immigration, as you profess to be, why do you not oppose the importation of contract labor? Why do you discriminate?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the aspect of the labor question covered by this amendment constitutes one of the reasons why I expect to vote for this bill. I am very glad indeed to see that the attempt that has been made to inject prejudice of one kind or another, religious or otherwise, into this question has not been successful. And I was much gratified to see, in particular, the patriotic American spirit in which both sides of the House have discountenanced an effort to attach to the bill an amendment involving a question now under diplomatic negotiation between two great Governments.

Mr. Chairman, in my vote on this question no prejudice will We all recognize the fact that the greatness of America is largely due to the successful amalgamation of the different races of the world, and that many of the eminent and illustrious citizens of this Nation were born in foreign lands. But, Mr. Chairman, there is desirable and there is undesirable immigration, and just as injurious bacteria can be assimilated by the human organisms up to a certain point, after which it can not be done without serious results; so it is that after we absorb a certain amount of undesirable immigration we come to the point where the welfare of the Nation demands that it be stopped. And on this point, Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote the latest, and I believe the best, authority on this question, from a book called The Immigrant Invasion, by Dr. Frank Julian Warne, an author, of high repute, of several books on industrial questions. He takes this matter up in a way which is not partisan, but which is philosophical. And on page 312, after a mature and thorough consideration of this question, he after a mature and thorough consideration of this question, he states:

The statement that present immigration is affecting injuriously our democratic institutions is not the expression of a mere opinion; it is the recording of a well-considered conclusion, to which one is led as a result of numerous investigations of the problem extending now over a period of 13 years and more.

The late Francis A. Walker, who holds a distinguished place in the list of American economists, has this to say on the subject:

"For it is never to be forgotten that self-defense is the first law of nature and of nations. If that man who careth not for his own household is worse than an infidel, the nation which permits its institutions to be endangered by any cause which can fairly be removed is guilty, not less in Christian than in natural law. Charity begins at home, and while the people of the United States have gladly offered an asylum to millions upon millions of the distressed and unfortunate of other lands and climes, they have no right to carry their hospitality one step beyond the line where American institutions, the American rate of wages, the American standard of living are brought into serious peril. All the good the United States could do by offering indiscriminate hospitality to a few millions more of European peasants, whose places at home will within another generation be filled by others as miserable as themselves, would not compensate for any permanent injury done to our Republic."

"Our highest duty to charity and to humanity is to make this greates at the state of the laws and educated labor, the most triumphant success that can possibly be attained. In this way we shall do far more for Europe than by allowing its city slums and its vast stagnant reservoirs of degraded peasantry to be drained off upon our soil. "No nation in human history ever undertook to deal with such masses of alien population. That man must be a sentlmentalist and an optimist beyond all bounds of reason who believes that we can take such a l

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Immigration, after many months of consideration, has come to the conclusion that there is no other way, in view of the present unprecedented multitude of immigrants who are coming to this country, to decrease that number, except to apply this literacy test. And I wish to say, that being the case, at least until we need more men in this country—especially considering the fact that we must all admit there is here at least some depreciation in the labor market and depression in industrial lines—I say we all ought to agree that as long as that continues some effort should be made to curb this flood of immigration.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the old law provided for the admission of skilled labor when labor of like kind could not be found, and it frequently occurred that men came over as skilled laborers, and after they had gotten here and had gone to the expense of paying their steamship fare and all of that trouble skilled labor of the same kind would be found here, and the immigrant would be sent back.

In order to prevent just such troubles as that we provided in the old bill that that question should first be presented before they ever came or started; presented to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor at that time, now the Secretary of Labor; and if he decided in favor of the application, then they should be admitted.

Now, as was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], that was not altogether satisfactory to the gentlemen who represented the trades unions and the laboring people of the country. They thought there ought to be some provision which that question could be decided by appeal. it was provided that there should be permission given for an appeal during 30 days. That appeal is a part of the preliminary trial and preliminary hearing, and it is no hardship upon the men who want to come in, except for the fact that they are kept on the other side until this question is decided.

I think it is a wise provision, although it was not our provision. It was suggested, as has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, by Senator La Follette. But I think on mature consideration that it is a wise provision, because it is better that these men should wait on the other side for a decision upon that question rather than come over here on an uncertainty and then, perhaps, be turned back after they get herc. I therefore hope that that question of appeal will not be stricken out, because if the Secretary of Labor has not decided as some think the question ought to be decided, that right of appeal ought to be given.

I move now, Mr. Chairman, that debate on this amendment close.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford]. The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 5, after the word "supersedeas," strike out from and including the word "Provided" down to and including the word "servants" on line 11.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, in order that this amendment may be understood I desire to read the proviso which it is proposed to strike out. I read:

Provided further, That the provisions of this law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that a moment ago the committee refused to make an exception of the unfortunate women who can not read, and in view of the fact that the committee has refused to make exceptions of skilled labor that we might use in this country, I do not think we ought to except the professional classes or include in the professional classes those who come to be employed by Mrs. Astorbilt or some other millionairess as valets or personal servants.

That is what this proviso does. The wealthy lady or the rich man, the one who reserves himself to himself in his great mansion and wants a retinue of servants and a valet to put on his coat in the morning and to put on his spats when he leaves the house, can make a contract with "James" of England or with "François" of Paris. He can bring any one of those servants into this country under contract and they will be the contract and they will not be excluded under this law. We make a special and distinct favorite of "James, the butler," who comes in to please the aristocrat who is not satisfied with the service that can be obtained in the United States.

A moment ago you refused to permit an exception in the case of the female coming into the United States to do domestic service. We need her all over this country to-day. We need her in the homes of the people where this kind of work is to be done. But she is to be barred. She is not to come in, but James the butler is to come in to please the ladies of Fifth The silk-stocking end of it is preferred in this meas-Avenue.

ure. [Laughter.]

I want at this time to introduce a few facts in regard to those who are to be barred from the United States in favor of James the butler. Last year, according to a recently completed report of the Department of Labor, the immigrants coming into this country brought in with them $40,000,000—to be exact, $40,890,197—enough money to build the railroads in Alaska that you are now contending about. These foreigners brought that amount of money into the country, but now under this bill, as you have written it, you will bar out 84,000 females, many whom would make excellent servants and bring positive relief to the American housewife. Yet you propose in this paragraph to admit "James" and a few chauffeurs and a few valets and a few other domestic and personal servants whom the rich of this country want to bring in from Paris and London and Berlin.

I do not think the Democratic Party will stand for this preference for the rich. I do not think the Democratic Party will crowd out the poor in this respect. I do not think the Democratic Party will vote James the butler in by this bill, and hence I have moved to strike out this paragraph. [Laugh-

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman not only wants to keep out James the butler but he also wants to exclude ministers of religious denominations. I never was apprised before of the fact that the gentleman went so far in his sympathies for the butler and the domestic servants that he did not want the light of the Gospel shed upon the people of this country.

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman think we have enough clergymen in the United States now to shed the light of the

Mr. BURNETT. I am afraid not, because I am reliably informed that the light of the Gospel has not been shed upon the gentleman in six months or more. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman believe that the clergyman who comes in comes in to take money out, while the immigrant who comes in brings money, as I have just shown?

Mr. BURNETT. No. The preacher comes to stay with us, and the lecturer comes in to diffuse knowledge.

Mr. MOORE. And to make money.

Mr. BURNETT. The main fact is that those who are admitted under these provisions do not compete with the man who toils with his hands in the mines of the country or who is engaged in other manual labor. That is the reason. Chairman, it is the law that the gentleman's party put in there seven years ago, and I did not hear the gentleman then raising any complaint about it. It has been the law for seven years,
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 11, after the word "servants," insert "or farm laborers if employed in good faith by farmers."

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I think it stands to reason that if, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] says, the rich are to be permitted by law to import butlers and domestics, and that class of servants, the same as in the past, the farmers, who now get only 2 out of every 100 immigrants who are admitted into the United States, ought to be permitted at least to employ farm laborers from other countries without regard to the alien-contract provision.

A few months ago one of our North Dakota farmers, a Mr. Lockin, in order to save his crops, drove in search of help to a neighboring town, which happened to be across on the Manitoba side. He picked up five men over there, brought them back, and they went to work on his farm. Soon after that an immigra-tion officer arrested these five men, who happened to be Austrians, and arrested these live men, who happened to be Austrians, and arrested the farmer, and put them all in jail, where they waited until their trial, in December. Our district judge, Judge Amidon, being a broad-minded man, with a rare sense of justice, and taking a broad view of the situation and of the immigration law, let the farmer off with a nominal fine of $5 and released the five Austrians. But the immigration officer seemed to be somewhat outraged by that decision. He ordered the deportation of the aliens to Austria, not Canada, and he brought a civil action against the farmer for $1,000 for each man he had so employed, making a total of $5,000. That action is still pending against him, and if it is pressed and he has to pay, it will ruin him. The treatment of Mr. Lockin is monstrous. If he were so treated in a foreign land, we would be talking about admitting him to this supposed land of the free in order that he would escape the tyranny of an unenlightened govern-

There is another view of this matter. These farmers in North Dakota and other Northwestern States, and, in fact, in all the States, are now in open competition with the farmers of Canada. They must sell their products in the markets of the world and buy in a market confined to a large extent to the United States. The Government has listened to the call of the workers in large commercial centers for untaxed food, and now I think that at least to this partial extent labor ought to be liberated, so that the farmers may have an opportunity to employ labor on the same terms as their competitors across the border in Canada and in other countries. A Canadian farmer can write a letter to the Allan Steamship Co. and send them $50 ask for a good, strong Scotchman to work a year for $100 and board, and they will send him one back by the next steamer. And I want to tell you, gentlemen, that that Scotchman can kill admit that at certain seasons of the year there is a shortage of any two ordinary itinerant farm laborers such as we employ in North Dakota.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Suppose a farmer were to import some of these contract laborers and they did not desire to stay with him, could he hold them to work for him against their will under the laws of your State?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Why, no; and I do not think our farmers would want to hold a man in any sort of bondage or anything of that kind. All they want is simply the opportunity to solicit farm laborers to come. The trouble is that if a farm laborer starts from the old country without a definite destina-tion in view he is apt to get caught in New York and never get to the farmer. If he has a letter from a farmer, he is apt to go on to his destination; and if this amendment is adopted, the farmers may perhaps get their fair share of this immigration which they are surely entitled to.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield, in order to allow me to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] a question?

Mr. GARDNER. I am going to take the floor in my own right after the gentleman from North Dakota has completed his remarks

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think the farmers certainly have a right to more than 2 per cent of the immigrants who come to this country, because the farmers constitute about onethird of the population of the United States.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly. Mr. PLATT.

Were the five Austrians sent back to Austria? Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The newspapers took it up, and a young lawyer by the name of Seth Richardson volunteered to defend them without compensation, and after a hearing in court the same Judge Amidon said they were not to be deported back to Austria as had been decreed by the immigration officers, but they might be taken back to Manitoba.

Mr. Chairman, this proposal is fair from every standpoint, political or social.

If the farmers are permitted to employ farm laborers from abroad they will be benefited and the farm laborers themselves will be benefited. They would have to work hard it is true, because farm work is hard, but they would not have to work harder than in the countries from which they come. Such alien labor would be a great blessing to our farmers, and it would bring no sting to the conscience, because such laborers would work under proper conditions and eventually become owners or operators of farms themselves. In contradistinction to this I want to give a picture drawn by Dr. Lewis Thurber Guild, for many years a brilliant preacher of the Methodist Church and now editor of the Fargo Courier-News. He says:

Church and now editor of the Fargo Courier-News. He says;

The case of the Austrian laborers before Judge Amidon, recently commented upon in these columns, has aroused much discussion throughout the State. If it should result in a demand for amendment of our laws on immigration it would be a good thing.

The fact is that our industrial institutions, the coal mines, and the steel mills do take fearful toll from the well-intentioned, hard-working men who are made almost beasts of burden.

It is well to remember this when one hears the periodical agitation in Congress about restriction of immigration. The right kind of restriction is one thing, but there is another kind which virtually says:

"We are in. You are out. You stay out!"

But there is still another side to immigration. It is the bitter, cruel, industrial side which uses the blood and brawn, the bodies, and the lives of the children of immigrants to further our so-called progress, to build our great works, to carry on our great undertakings. Gordon Thayer thus expresses it in exceptionally strong verses:

"Breed us more men, ye Daughters of Toll;

"Breed us more men, ye Daughters of Toil;
Ye alien mothers in far-off lands,
Sire them strongly, clean brawn and bone,
For we sift from the chaff the wheat alone,
When they come to die at our hands.

"Think on our greed in your travall-throes,"
Think of us when ye bare your breast,
Mine and smelter shall claim their toll,
Roads shall be broken and reach their goal,
Though ye smell their blood from the West.

"We build us strong on your woman's woe Pier of granite and iron span, Glare of furnace and caisson's gloom, Crane and derrick shall rear the tomb Of him whom ye gave us—a man.

Seas shall not bar your sons from harm; Steppe or forest or Alpine slope, Our arms are long to grasp what we need, The New World springs from your trampled seed; Ye drain the dregs of our draught of Hope."

[Applause.] The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to farm labor, because farmers can not give steady jobs in the winter to as many men as they can give steady jobs to in the

The reason I interrupted the gentleman from North Dakota by asking him the question as to whether the farmer could retain these contract laborers against their will was because I had in mind an experiment tried by the State of South Carolina a number of years ago.

The commissioner of agriculture of that State, Mr. Watson, was much interested in securing certain legislation under which South Carolina-illegally, I think-imported from 700 to 800 immigrants in a vessel which she chartered. They were nominally brought to America to work on the farms. That was the theory ostensibly, anyway.

The immigrants no sooner got to the State of South Carolina than those who took service on the farm at all refused to stay there because they were offered higher wages in the cotton Within a year half of these contract farm laborers who had been imported by the State of South Carolina had left the State of South Carolina and had been merged into the general immigration of the United States or had returned to their own country. I am told that not one single one of those men imported as farm laborers by the State of South Carolina can be found within the confines of that Commonwealth to-day.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GARDNER. With pleasure.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would like to ask the gen-tleman whether the case he has mentioned was not a large colonization scheme?

Mr. GARDNER. Seven hundred and odd.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if these men had come in one by one each in response to a letter from a farmer and had come here in that way and sort of become members of the farmer's family, does not be think they would have become attached to the farm and the community and the soil?

Mr. GARDNER. I think that the contract-labor law creates a hardship in certain cases, but you can not draw a general law without hurting some one.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, it is true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts states, that some years ago South Carolina started to import farm laborers. Why this project was not successful is well known to the gentleman from Massachusetts. These men did not remain in South Carolina because after a short stay there they found conditions absolutely unbearable. The agents that were sent out to bring the Belgians over here made certain representations to them which were not lived up to. They promised them excellent homes, good wages, and they promised them that they would be properly treated. After these people arrived here they found conditions much different from what they had been represented to be, and they found that the promises that had been made to them were not to be fulfilled. Naturally, under the circumstances, they refused to remain, and at the first opportunity that presented itself many left that section of the country.

I wish to assure the gentleman from Massachusetts that the people who come without being promised double and treble wages, who come here on their own initiative, and who are not misled by false representations as to the possibilities here, do go to work on the farm, and they remain on the farm and make excellent laboring men and excellent farmers. [Applause.] It has been stated on the floor of this House time and time again that the immigrants do not go on the farms. That is a misstatement, for the statistics will show that a large percentage of the people residing in the rural districts of the northern, western, and northwestern sections of our country are of foreign birth or foreign parentage.

I have before me figures taken from a report of the Bureau of the Census which show that in 1910 in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania 31 per cent of the rural population was of foreign birth or of foreign parentage. In the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin 32 per cent was of foreign birth or foreign parentage; in Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas 40 per cent of the people residing in the rural districts were of foreign birth or foreign parentage; in the States of Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, and Nevada we find the percentage the same-40 per cent of the rural population is foreign born or of foreign parentage; and, lastly, in the States on the Pacific coast-Washington, Oregon, and California—we find that over 42 per cent of the people who are making their homes on the farms are of foreign birth or of foreign parentage.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this House, I ask you if this is not conclusive proof that the immigrant does go on the farm, that he does not remain in the larger cities, and that he is one of the pioneers in the "back-to-the-land" movement?

For the edification of some of the gentlemen who are of the opinion that this influx of immigrants is harmful to our country, I wish to read some further statistics, taken from a report the Director of the Census, which show that in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin 75.4 per cent of the farm land is improved, whereas in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida you will find but 46.7 per cent improved. In the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas you will find 70.6 per cent of the farm land improved, as contrasted with 53.9 per cent in Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi.

You will find that in those States where there is a large percentage of the farm land improved there is also a large percentage of the rural population composed of these same "unde-sirable" foreigners, as my friends from the South choose to call them, while in Southern States, with their large percentage of native-born whites, you will find a very small percentage of the farm land improved.

This again emphasizes the fact that wherever you go you will find that the farmer of foreign birth or foreign parentage is thrifty, industrious, and a willing worker, and that he should be considered a national asset of inestimable value.

For years I have been closely in touch with immigrants and I am thoroughly familiar with their ambitions, their ideals, their aspirations, and I believe I am safe in saying that there is nothing closer to their hearts than their desire to get out in the country and settle on some land which they can some day call their own. Although they may go to the large centers when they first land, because they are not yet familiar with conditions here and do not know what sections of the country are the most desirable, at their first opportunity they leave the city behind them and hasten into the country, into the forests, and onto the prairies, which within a short space of time they turn into fertile fields and productive farms. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is arguing far afield from the proposition stated in the amendment, but I do not desire to reply at length. Here is the record of the commissioner general, who shows the sections of the country affected by the literacy test, and not 2 per cent that come from southern Europe turn out to be farm laborers or ever go on the

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. No. That was just simply a reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. In reply to statements made here I will say that the danger of this amendment is perhaps not so much along the Canadian border, but along the Mexican border. If those people are permitted to come over under contracts for the purpose of helping to gather the cottonand that is my country and we do often need more labor than we have—the danger of admitting them in violation of the contract-labor law or any other law is that those people as soon as they get over here go out and circulate all over the country, and come in competition with the real laborers that stay here for the purpose of building up the material prosperity of the That is the objection that I have to making them an exception to the contract-labor law.

I move now, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed. The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that all debate on the section and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the motion to include the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that to be the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; that is my motion.
Mr. MOORE. But there are at least two more amendments that are to be offered. Mr. BURNETT.

That does not preclude the offering of amendments

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 15, after the word "States," add the following: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall exclude anybody who can prove that his grandfather could read."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at the request of the chairman of the committee, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 15, strike out the words "and persons who have been insane within five years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARDNER) there were—ayes 47, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the chairman of the committee I wish to offer a further amendment striking out the words "women or girls," on page 5, line 17, and inserting the word "persons." All that this amendment does—that I may proceed for half a minute in order that I may explain the sources of all these amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object. The committee has decided that it is not going to debate this matter further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the chairman of the committee I offer another amendment, coming from the Secretary of Labor; on page 6, line 19, after the word "by" insert the words "or not coming to."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 19, after the word "by," insert the words "or not coming to."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I think there is an error in that.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. Can this be debated? The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to explain it for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. But the committee has closed all debate, Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

unanimous consent. The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection, Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this is recommended by the Secretary of Labor under these words:

Change the clause to read: "All children under 16 years of age unaccompanied by or not coming to one or both of their parents." Such a change would make the conditions of the law conform to the long-existing practice regarding the application of a similar provision in the act of 1907.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment be adopted it will preclude by any chance the father or mother who would be here and the child would remain with the grandparents abroad to be brought in here.

Mr. GARDNER. On the contrary, it broadens it and makes it easier to bring them in.

Mr. SABATH. Not the way it is amended now.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 22, after the word "in," insert the words "the contract-labor or reading-test provisions of this act."

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, lines 10 and 11, after the words "learned professions," strike out the words "or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes and that I have two minutes on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have two minutes and he may have two minutes to debate this amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman defend his amendment, or shall I speak first?

Mr. MOORE. I shall be glad to speak first if the gentleman so desires

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in view of the fact that an amendment was voted down a few moments ago which proposed to give the farmers along the Canadian border the right to have labor coming over the border to help them out in harvest time. That was rejected. Now, I insist, this House ought not to make a preference in favor of the wealthy people along Fifth Avenue or in the wealthy circles of any other city who are not content with such labor as they can contract for in the United States, but who insist upon going to Paris, London, and Berlin to contract for valets or personal servants. If they can not get such help in the United States, we ought not to give them a special privilege to avoid the contract-labor law to obtain valets, domestic servants, and so forth, abroad.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this clause in the law has nothing to do with James, the valet, or Alphonse, the chef. Those specialists come over here as first-class travelers. This clause has to do with Martha and Mary, girls who do not like to come to this country on speculation as to where they are going to bring up. Martha and Mary do not like to come here from New Brunswick or Nova Scotia unless they are sure of a situation awaiting them. We know mighty well, Mr. Chairman, how dangerous it is to permit young women to come as strangers into any country unless they have some definite place to go to and some assured opportunity of earning a living.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. ROGERS. To move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not help the gentleman, because that is no more debatable than anything else.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for one minute in which I may make an inquiry of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objections to the constant of the committee.

on? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Mr. ROGERS. I should like to ask some member of the committee, referring to the last two provisos of section 3, which are in lines 11 to 15, on page 11, whether some such restriction as has just been adopted by means of a committee amendment in case of exhibitors at fairs or expositions ought not to be inserted here in connection with the wives and minor children of citizens of the United States, and perhaps also in connection with the suites of the representatives of foreign governments.

Mr GARDNER Mr Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman for one minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. I will say to the gentleman that we think not. This right of free ingress for the suites of foreign ministers, ambassadors, and so forth, probably exists under international law anyway. For a long time they have been exempt from the operation of our immigration laws, and no question has been raised. It is presumable that no ambassador or minister would introduce into the United States any member of his suite suffering from a contagious disease. Probably international law presupposes that foreign nations shall be privileged to send whom they choose to represent them here.

Now, one word more as to this question of excluding under any circumstances the wife and minor children of a citizen of the United States. The provision prohibiting such exclusion was inserted, if I am not mistaken, without much discussion when the immigration bill was up in the Senate a year or two ago. I believe that the wife of a citizen of the United States, even if he is a naturalized citizen, ought to have exactly the same rights as your wife and my wife, but she will not always have them, and the children of a naturalized citizen will not always have the same rights as our children, unless we retain in this bill this provision exempting wives and children of American citizens from the operation of this law. The gentleman, of course, knows that children born prior to the naturalization of their parents have been held by the courts to be

Mr. ROGERS. Suppose the wife is a prostitute?

Mr. GARDNER. We must admit the prostitute wife of a naturalized American citizen just as readily as we admit the prostitute wife of a native-born American citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore].

The amendment was rejected. Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 15, strike out the words "four months" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 6. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of section 5 of this act to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit any alien to come into the United States by promise of employment through advertisements printed, published, or distributed in any foreign country, whether such promise is true or faise, and either the civil or criminal penalty imposed by said section shall be applicable to such a case: Provided, That States or Territories, the District of Columbia, or places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States may advertise, and by written or oral communication with prospective alien settlers make known, the inducements they offer for immigration thereto, respectively.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, strike out the proviso in lines 2 to 6, inclusive.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, my motion is to strike out this proviso:

That States or Territories, the District of Columbia, or places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, may advertise, and by written or oral communication with prospective allen settlers make known, the inducements they offer for immigration thereto, respectively.

Only a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts stated that some years ago South Carolina brought over a shipload of immigrants, and that these immigrants did not remain there very long. I am satisfied that not only South Carolina, but some other adjoining States, do not at this time seek immigration. I realize that were the people of these communities as familiar with the benefits to be derived from immigration as are we who come from sections where there are a great many immigrants, they would be anxious to have these immigrants come to their States and help them develop that country. It seems that they are prejudiced against immigration; yet if they would only stop to think, they would realize that the great development that has taken place throughout the northern and western sections of this country during the past 25 years has been in a great measure due to immigration. These immigrants have settled on lands which had lain dormant for years, and which, as a result of their efforts, are now yielding great harvests that tax the capacity of our granaries and help to feed hundreds of thousands of our people. Let these individuals who are opposed to immigration imagine, if they can, what would be the condition of these sections of our country. to-day had it not been for the immigrants. They have made a veritable garden out of what was once a wilderness.

These people from the communities where there is so much opposition to immigration have become prejudiced through articles that have appeared in the papers in these sections, and through communications which have been sent them by certain organizations. In view of that fact, I do not think it is fair that they should be permitted to advertise for immigration or seek to bring it to those sections where it is not wanted. and where the immigrants would not be made welcome,

I am of the opinion that, if they were permitted to stimulate immigration and contract for it, it would be unsatisfactory not only to them but to the immigrants as well, for these people do not desire to go to a section of the country where they are made to feel that they are outcasts and where their honest work is not appreciated. They come to this great Republic of ours not only to better their financial condition, but to make their homes where they can be free from tyranny and oppression, and they do not wish to be subjected to the same kind of treatment that was accorded those who were imported into South Carolina some years ago. I believe that this section of the bill should be eliminated, so that there may be no repetition of that unfortunate trial, and which has continuously been used against the present-day immigration with such telling effect that a great many people have been prejudiced by it.

Mr. Chairman, I feel confident that if the people of South Carolina had understood the people whom they attempted to colonize in that State that by this time there would be a universal demand from that section of the country for immigration. Unfortunately for South Carolina, as well as for the adjoining States, this failure to comprehend the many intricate questions which were involved and to make due allowance for the difficulties under which these people were laboring resulted in conditions being made unbearable for them, and consequently the project was a failure.

People of every race and every nation have their peculiarities; their environments are different and conditions are such as to give them an outlook upon life which varies considerably from that of the people of other and strange countries. It is not fair to expect these people to conform to our customs and adopt our practices as though they had been familiar with them all of their life. Naturally it requires some little time for them to familiarize themselves with conditions which are entirely new to them.

Even though to-day we find the gentlemen from Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee objecting to immigration, I am of the firm belief that within a few years the people of South Carolina will realize the grave mistake they made and will welcome among them these people which they now class as "undesir-

These immigrants have fully demonstrated in the sections where they have settled that they are honest, industrious, lawabiding people; that they love the life on the farm; and that they make most desirable citizens. However, until their worth is recognized and they are appreciated at their true value, I do not believe that any community or any State or any section of the country should be permitted to offer inducements to these immigrants and seek to lure them within their confines.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not occupy as much as five minutes, but I do feel, as a Representative from one of the States that has apparently earned the contempt of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath], that I ought to say a word in reply to his suggestion.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes. Mr. SABATH. I wish to state to the gentleman from Texas that I did not have that State in mind at all, because a great many of our people do go to Texas, and they are there properly treated, and they do make good citizens.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will correct my statement and say that as a man who began his existence in one of the Southern States and who now has the good fortune to reside in Texas, I protest against the gentleman's suggestion.

He says that if we in the South were as well advised on questions of political economy and political science, or words to that effect, as people are in the North, and presumably as they are in the city of Chicago, we would take a different position on this question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be that some things in these sciences have been revealed to the gentleman which we have not yet comprehended, but I have seen no evidence on the floor of this House to indicate the truth of his position in that respect. The people in the South are confronted, and have been for 50 years, by problems that he little comprehends, if he has ever undertaken to study them. The position of the people of the South on this question does not grow out of religious prejudice. Their position on this question has been forced on them by conditions so complex, so incomprehensible to him and other men who have not known it from personal contact, that it would be an utter waste of your time for me to undertake to discuss it here. But I do resent the suggestion that the people of the South, the people who helped to found this Government and who have developed great Commonwealths, honestly, economically, and wisely administered, are in need of his sympathies or his methods.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SLAYDEN. I do. Mr. SABATH. I think the gentleman misunderstood me if he thinks I stated anything about religious questions. I did not intend to, and I know I did not.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

GARDNER] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this proviso that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] seeks to strike out is not the proviso under which South Carolina imported her immigrants. It was under a doubtful construction of the law of 1903 that she acted. The act of 1907 definitely prohibited such a course. This provision which it is proposed to strike out has been carried for a great many years in the immigration law. I have in my hand the immigration law of 1903. It carries this provision, and the immigration law of 1907 carries this provision. The only change which we make in the wording consists in the insertion of these words "and by written or oral communication with prospective alien settlers make known."

The reason for the insertion of those words, as stated in the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration for 1911, is

To the proviso allowing States and Territories to advertise their inducements to immigration is added a specification of exactly what they may do to make their advertisements effective. This is in the interest of clearness, and is only fair to those States that really desire and need a good class of immigration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can understand how restrictionists like myself should be opposed to permitting States to advertise their inducements in foreign newspapers, but I can not understand how anyone who takes the opposite point of view, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], can seek to amend this bill in this particular.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Of course I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts know that I have been at all times opposed to contract labor and against stimulated immigration?

Mr. GARDNER. I think so.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] in his allusions to the Southern States referred to Tennessee, I wish to say to him that there is absolutely no foundation upon which to base his insinuations or statements. The laboring men in Tennessee have just as many advantages and opportunities and are just as kindly and generously treated as laboring men in New York or Chicago. I wish to say that there are fewer of them out of employment than there are in New York City or Chicago, for I hold in my hand a copy of to-day's New York Times to which I desire to call the gentleman's attention

"Three hundred and fifty thousand men now out of work here, and most of them have homes and families to support," says the Charity Association. One hundred and forty thousand laborers are idle.

The article states:

There are more than 325,000 men in New York City trying to find employment, according to a report that has just been completed by the bureau of employment of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor. Furthermore, the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor significantly points out that these statistics represent for the most part men who have homes and families to support.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. AUSTIN. In a moment. [Reading:]

I commend to my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] and to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle], whom I see on his feet, whether they need any more allens landed in New York City, and can those gentlemen provide them with employment?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman pardon me?
Mr. AUSTIN. I shall be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does not the gentleman from Texas

Mr. AUSTIN. Pardon me, I have been charged with everything else, but do not charge me up to the State of Texas. They do not elect any Republicans in Texas, I am sorry to say

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I beg the gentleman's pardon for saying he is from Texas. Texas is a very good State, however.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does not the gentleman know, first, that to the city of New York come daily many thousands of men from every State of the Union thinking that they can get employment in that city, and these men—

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the gentleman's question?
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And these men swell the large class of the so-called unemployed?
Mr. AUSTIN. What is the gentleman's question?
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to know whether the gentleman is aware of that fact?

The bureau of employment of the association has spent two months making a careful investigation of conditions here. In the course of that inquiry agents of the association personally gathered the data for their report from the representatives of various trade-unions, managers of large construction companies, and industrial corporations, as well as from employment agencies and charitable institutions.

We are confident that the timeworn platitude "anyone can find work if he really wants it" is not warranted by the facts, and it is, to say Mr. AUSTIN. I am aware of the fact that thousands of these ralized American citizens with families who are walking the streets of New York City begging and pleading for employment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ten-NR. GOLLD' GOLLD. Mr. Charlman, the Settlements of New York, that great city composed of five large boroughs, that has within it myriads of commercial, industrial, and manufacturing establishments of every kind, business establishments of almost every conceivable variety—to this city come from every State in the Union hundreds of thousands of men throughout the year who are without employment during certain months of the year in the places where they come from or reside. They come in and go out, some remaining a week, some a month, some a day, but no one is able to keep track of them or to ascertain their When these itinerants, especially at times when trade happens temporarily to be slow, as at times it will be everywhere, some one undertakes to figure up how many unemployed there are in the city. These figures are matters of pure guess-work. They are by no means authentic. They come from unofficial sources. Many thousands of those who are unemployed and go to the charities for relief do not really belong to New York City. They come from anywhere and everywhere, and there is no telling or ascertainment from how many different States of the Union they really come from.

So the gentleman from Tennessee is most unfair to the city I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. The gentleman does not understand the conditions that prevail in my city.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not this article state that practically all of these men are men of families residing in New York City?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have not read the article.

Mr. AUSTIN. I read it to you.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. There are thousands and thousands or men among the unemployed in New York City who have no habitation in that city.

Mr. CONRY. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GOLDFOGLE, Certainly.
Mr. CONRY. Is it not true that during the months or January, February, and March the building trades are practically at a standstill in New York City, and at other seasons of the year these workmen engaged in these particular lines receive remunerative salaries and are constantly employed, and that these sociological workers always apply themselves to taking a census during the months of January, February, and March, when these large numbers of men employed in the building trades are out of employment?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. My colleague states the position accurately; that is exactly the state of affairs that prevails. The gentleman from Tennessee is in error in regard to the conditions in New York City.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in error in reading a report of a city official of New York describing these conditions,

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It is not a report of a city official at all. understand the gentleman wanted it understood that in my city there was such a tremendous number of resident aliens unemployed that there was no reason why we should permit further immigration.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is what the report says. You must not criticize what I say, but your own city officials.
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have neglected to ask my friend from Tennessee how many unemployed there are in Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. I stated that our people were practically all employed.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. As just suggested to me by the gentleman on my left, our people are practically all employed, too.

Mr. AUSTIN. Why does a letter like this go to the State of Maine offering to furnish labor for less wages than are paid in the State of Maine?

Mr. MANN. That is the result of the tariff.
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No; it is not. Mr. Chairman, surely no man in this House can suppose that in a city like New York, with over 6,000,000 population, there will always be employment for everyone. There must of necessity always be a large number at different seasons of the year out of employment, while at other seasons of the year out of employment, while at other seasons of the year they receive remunerative employment. They ought to understand that people come to the metropolis from everywhere thinking that all they have to do is to come to us and get employment at once. They find themselves sometimes—yes, often—stranded. They remain a while, and, I presume, return to their own villages and towns and cities. It is to our city that these wandering bands and itinerant classes, who are unofficially numbered among the employed, come. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section close.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath].

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, society, company; partnership, corporation, or others engaged in the business of transporting aliens to the United States, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels, directly or indirectly, by writing, printing, or oral representation, to solicit, invite, or encourage any alien to come into the United States, and anyone violating any provision hereof shall be subject to either the civil or the criminal prosecution prescribed by section 5 of this act; or if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any owner, master, officer, or agent of a vessel has brought or caused to be brought to a port of the United States any alien so solicited, invited, or encouraged to come by such owner, master, officer, or agent shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located, or in which any vessel of the line may be found, the sum of $400 for each and every such violation; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine imposed remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided purther, That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that the provisions of this section are persistently violated by or on behalf of any transportation company, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to deny to such company the privilege of landing alien immigrant passengers of any or all classes at United States ports for such a period as in his judgment may be necessary to insure an observance of such provisions: Provided further, That this section shall not be held to prevent transportation companies from issuing letters, circulars, or advertisemen

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is the season of the year when throughout the land men are unemployed. Always at this time of the year there are a large number of unemployed in our great cities. At this season of the year usually in the past stories have appeared in the daily papers describing the length of the bread lines in the various cities of the country. We hear no stories of that kind now. Every month, every week, and every day the reports of the Department of Commerce show that our factories are manufacturing a larger output than they have in the past; we are exporting more than ever and we are importing more than we ever did, but the balance of trade is always in our favor. This is the season when men can not work out of doors, and men who do that kind of work are therefore necessarily unemployed.

Just a little while ago attention was called to the fact that in Canada they can import laborers for farms and that we can not do it here under our laws, and the inference from that sort of statement always is that the farmers of this country are about to be brought into competition with cheap labor up there in Canada, and with cereals raised upon the cheap farms of Canada. And now I want to put in the Record some evidence with reference to this fact, and, if possible, to end forever this argument made so frequently upon this floor and elsewhere that the farmers of this country are about to be brought into competition with cheap labor and with the product of cheaper lands in Canada, I want to show what they pay farm laborers in Canada. I do not agree with the statement made by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Young] a while ago that a Scotchman imported from Scotland and put to work in the wheat fields of Canada can do as much work as two men who work in North Dakota.

If he had made that statement back in the great wheat section of North Dakota he would find thousands and thousands of farm laborers ready to combat the proposition. an official publication of the Dominion of Canada for the year 1910, the Canadian Yearbook. It is the last one that I am able to get hold of, although I think one has been published since that time. According to this publication, farm laborers in British Columbia, males, receive $57.40 per month during the summer months. Females receive during the summer months $38 per month. In Alberta, the great wheat section of Canada, farm laborers, males, get $40 per month, and females working on farms $27.50 per month. In Saskatchewan farm laborers, males, get $40 per month, and females $24.50 per month. In Quebec farm laborers get $36.40 per month, males, and females get $18.98 per month, and so on. These figures show that in the great agricultural sections of Canada, the wheat sections, they are paying farm laborers more per month than they are paid on our Dakota farms, and that is the cheap labor that we are to be brought into competition with when free cereals are brought over the border.

As to the value of farm lands in the wheat sections of Canada, I desire to call attention to a statement made also in this Canadian Yearbook. In British Columbia the average value of occupied farm land is $74 per acre. How does that compare with the average value of farm lands in the Dakotas? In Alberta, the great wheat section of Canada, the average value of farm lands is $24 per acre; in Saskatchewan it is $22 per acre; and in Manitoba, $28.67 per acre; while in Quebec it is $40.50 per acre; and in Ontario, $48 per acre. These are the official figures given in this publication for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.
Mr. MANAHAN. What is the value in Illinois?
Mr. RAINEY. Illinois is not a wheat-producing State. I do not know what the value is, but I presume it is about the same as in British Columbia—not much higher—that is, the average value of farm lands. We do not claim for Illinois that it is a wheat-producing State. Illinois is a corn State; and, while we produce wheat there, corn is our principal crop, and corn lands are always worth more than wheat lands. The various Canadian Provinces are not corn-producing lands. If ultimately, on account of the Underwood tariff bill, we are brought into competition with Canada in the matter of cereals, it is fairer to compare the value of farm lands in the border States of the Northwest with the value of farm lands in the Canadian Provinces. If there is any competition, there is where the competition will be.

In 1910 the average value of farm lands in Oregon amounted to $35.23 per acre. In Minnesota in that year the average value of farm lands was $36.82 per acre; in North Dakota, $25.69 per acre-less than in most of the Canadian Provinces and about the same as the value of lands in Alberta, the great wheatproducing section of Canada. In South Dakota the value of farm lands was $34 per acre in that year. For the entire United States the average value per acre of farm lands in 1910 was $32.40—less per acre than the average value of occupied farm lands in all of Canada.

I undertake to say that no State in the Union pays farm laborers as much as the Canadian Provinces pay. In Illinois the average amount of wages paid to a farm laborer is as large as in any other State—perhaps larger—and, according to the census we have just completed, the average annual wage of a farm laborer in Illinois is $259. According to the Canadian Yearbook, which I have here, in Alberta the average wage per year of a farm laborer amounts to $416. In Saskatchewan a farm laborer receives per annum an average wage of $402.50. In Manitoba a farm laborer receives on an average $400 per annum. I have given here the average wages paid males.

The average wage in these Canadian Provinces paid female help on a farm per year is much larger than the average wage paid the same kind of help in the United States. In Alberta they pay an average wage of $300 per year for female help on a farm; in Saskatchewan, $263.60; in Manitoba, $282.

I therefore submit that the farmers of the United States, on account of the recent tariff law, are not being brought into contact with cheap labor in Canada and with the product of cheap farming lands in that country, and they are not likely at any time in the future to be compelled to contend with the product of cheap lands and cheap labor across our northern boundary. During the greater portion of the year wheat commands a higher price in Winnipeg than in either Chicago or Minne-apolis. The result of the Underwood tariff bill will be that when there is a shortage of wheat in this country wheat will come in from Canada if the Canadian wheat crop is ample.

Whenever there is a shortage in the wheat crop in Canada our farmers will have the advantage of the Canadian market, and during a period of that kind wheat will be welcomed in Canada when it comes from the United States. On account of the difference in latitude and difference in climatic conditions it will often happen that when there is a shortage in the wheat crop of one country there will be an ample wheat crop in the other, and when this occurs wheat will move from that country which produces an abundant crop to the other country where the crop is not so large. The removal of the tariff on wheat and other cereals between the two countries, when it does come under the provisions of the Underwood bill, will operate in the interest of common humanity and to the advantage of the consumers of both countries and to the disadvantage of the producers in neither country.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this section.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not press that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this section.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, as soon as this section was read, as a member of the committee I rose. The gentleman then presiding in the chair looked at me directly and then turned and looked in the direction of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who is not on the committee, and recognized him, and I ask if that is parliamentary?

The CHAIRMAN. Recognition goes by preference to the chairman of the committee. The gentleman from Alabama is chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANAHAN. But, Mr. Chairman, my inquiry is not as to the present situation but to what occurred when I rose to offer an amendment which goes to the merits of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will be

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will be permitted to submit his amendment, but that is not interfered with by the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MANAHAN. Of course, if the gentleman desires to foretlose in that way, well and good.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment read. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 10, after the word "States," insert "or engaged in transportation in the United States by the payment of commissions or rebates to steamship companies or to foreign agents or employees or any such transportation or steamship company."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, the point of this amendment is very obvious; it is to make the violation of the law not only include transportation companies at sea but also the railroad companies of the United States. It is a well-known fact that the railroad companies assist the steamship companies in the matter of soliciting immigration and pay money by way of rebates out of the fares they collect for carrying immigrants for that purpose. The reports before the Interstate Commerce Commission, or at least to congressional committees, will disclose the fact that the transportation companies have done that sort of thing in the past and it is, to my mind, very much more important that this encouraging of immigration should be stopped than to restrict and keep out men who of their own volition desire to come here to make homes for themselves in this country. I think the policy of this bill which concentrates its force against the coming in of immigrants themselves rather than concentrating its force against the corporations of this country who induce the immigration is all wrong.

I am as much opposed as any man could be to an unnatural, unhealthy immigration brought about by misleading advertise ments, by false words spoken by agents, and by promises held out by transportation companies, and by exploiting corporations, and I will go as far as any man to stop that evil practice; but this section, as it is now, does not touch one of the most flagrant violators of the law, and that is the railroad companies of the United States who pay back to the steamship companies delivering immigrants to them for transportation so much per head upon every immigrant they so delive: at the port of landing in this country. Now, then, why not, I ask the chairman of the committee, why not incorporate into this section-and if my language is not felicitous enough to do it properly let the committee itself put in an amendment, so as to include the railroad corporations and stop them also from promoting immigration. It is known that the railroad-transportation interests in this country really pay the salaries of the soliciting agents in the end. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully urge the committee and the House to incorporate those words into this section, so as to make it a stronger section than it is now, and include within the inhibitions the transportation companies on land as well as the transportation companies on sea. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if the same object would not be attained by inserting in line 9, page 14, the words "or in."

Mr. MANAHAN. Yes; I think it would attain the same object and be better language.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I can state for the chairman of the committee that if the gentleman will offer that amendment that it will be accepted so far as the chairman and myself are concerned.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment to include in line 9, after the word "to," the words "or in."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment heretofore sent to the desk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Now, the gentleman offers an amendment, Chair hears none. which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 9, after the word "to," insert the words "or in," so that the line will read "engaged in the business of transporting aliens to or in the United States," etc.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the paragraph of this section which reads as follows:

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman object to the question being put on the amendment of the gentleman from Minne-

Mr. TEMPLE. Not at all.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. TEMPLE, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the paragraph of this section which reads as follows:

Sec. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, society, company, partnership, corporation, or others engaged in the business of transporting aliens to the United States, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels, directly or indirectly, by writing, printing, or oral representation, to solicit, invite, or encourage any alien to come into the United States, and anyone violating any provision hereof shall be subject to either the civil or the criminal prosecution prescribed by section 5 of this act.

If we turn to section 5, here referred to, we find that the criminal prosecution which it provides may result in a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment of from six months to two years. Now, to apply this, an agent of a vessel to engage in oral representation and by word of mouth invite a foreigner to come to this country, must be where the alien is. If he is to use oral representation to a German he must be in Germany in order to do it. This, then, is an attempt to exercise jurisdiction over a German agent living in Germany for inviting a German subject to come to the United States, and the supposed offense against a law of the United States is committed in Germany. Does anyone suppose that the German Government would quietly submit to the attempt to exercise such jurisdiction?

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. TEMPLE. Very willingly. Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is trying to show that by this provision we claim extraterritorial jurisdiction?

Mr. TEMPLE. Precisely.

Mr. GARDNER. In criminal matters.

Mr. TEMPLE. Extraterritorial jurisdiction in criminal matters. And the United States Government has resented that claim on the part of other governments when they attempted to exercise it over those who had done certain acts in the United States that were contrary to the laws of foreign coun-United States that were contrary to the laws of foreign contries. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this language is not a part of the existing law?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. I believed it was a part of the existing law, and my purpose is not now to move any amendment, but to call attention to a crudity in the law that ought to be elimi-We have never yet nated. It has always been a dead letter. tried to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction under this paragraph, but in a later part of the bill there is a section which is not in existing law, and in which we provide that American officers in uniform shall exercise the jurisdiction of the United States in ships of foreign countries, and foreign powers have already protested against that section.

Mr. GARDNER. Of course, we are not at that point yet, but I suggest for the gentleman's contemplation whether or not there is any criminal feature in our attempt at an extraterritorial furisdiction in the matter of putting surgeons on vessels.

Mr. TEMPLE. Not at all. Mr. GARDNER. There is a distinction.

Mr. TEMPLE. And a very wide distinction. I was going to make this use of what I was saying: This has been a dead letter. So far we have never attempted to exercise jurisdiction under the law as it stands, but we are going to attempt to exercise American jurisdiction in foreign ships, and that makes it possible that we shall attempt, even with this section, to do what we have never done before.

I should like to read from letters, let me say, of two Secretaries of State in correspondence with foreign powers in regard to this-from a letter of Mr. Calhoun written in 1844 and from a letter of Secretary Cass written in 1859. I shall read the last one first, for I fear I shall not have time to read them both. On February 23, 1859, Mr. Cass wrote to Mr. Dallas, then our minister to Great Britain, about a case in which Great Britain was attempting to exercise jurisdiction over certain men for an offense committed in the United States against the laws of Great Britain. Mr. Cass said:

By the law of nations every independent State possesses the exclusive right of police over all persons within its jurisdiction, whether upon its soil or in its vessels upon the ocean, and this national prerogative can only be interfered with in cases where acts of piracy are committed, which, by the public law of the world, are cognizable by any power seizing the vessel thus excluded from the common rights of the ocean.

All I wanted to do was to call attention to this crudity in the law that ought to be eliminated, and to the danger that it may become a live issue, since we are attempting to make alive a like claim in another section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

All time has expired.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, has all time expired?
The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. Does the gentleman wish to offer an amendment?

Mr. MANAHAN. I did not understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts consumed his five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not sure whether he did or not, but would ask the gentleman if he wishes to offer an amendment?

Mr. MANAHAN. I do. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 12, after the word "representation," insert the words "or by the payment of any rebates or commissions."

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent for two minutes on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I inadvertently omitted this from my other amendment, and I desire now to incorporate it after the word "representation," in line 12. I think it will be very obvious that it is just as reprehensible for a steamship or transportation company to encourage alien immigration by payment of rebates and commissions as it is by oral representation.

In fact, the most efficient way to encourage immigration is for the railroad company to offer a rebate of $1 or $4 per head for every passenger they transport over their lines to the agent who procures the immigrant. It is a much more effective way to encourage immigration for a transportation company to give agents commissions and to give foreign concerns commissions and to give foreign representatives commissions than it is by simple writing or making verbal representations; and if gentlemen are really in favor of restrictive immigration by cutting off the evil of these transportation companies promoting immi-gration, I am sure they will agree with me that this is a proper amendment

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to oppose that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts ask for time by unanimous consent?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there ob-

There was no objection. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, that sort of an amendment very difficult to understand without taking it in connection with the entire section. It may be all right; it may not. If it is all right, there will be no difficulty in getting it adopted in the Committee on Immigration of the Senate.

At first sight it occurs to me that to prohibit the transportation companies from paying commissions would be held to be such a prohibition as to make it impossible for the transportation companies to have an agent in Paris, for instance.

Now, as to just how this amendment is to be construed in connection with the words "solicit, invite, or encourage," my mind does not work quickly enough to determine.

Moreover, here is a section in the present law which we leave unchanged; at least, the part which the gentleman seeks to amend is word for word the section under which we have been operating for years. No circumstance has been brought to our attention which would indicate the need for any such legislation as the gentleman proposes. I have here all suggestions made by the present Secretary of Labor. I have here all suggestions made by his predecessor, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and all the suggestions made by Mr. Commissioner Keefe. None of these authorities indicate a need for this legislation. We are reenacting this part of the law just as it has been for many a year. I, for one, am not willing to vote offhand for an amendment which I admit sounds plausible, but which on inspection may be found to be very much more far-reaching than

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed over. I think if it is passed over I can show evidence to the "doubting Thomases" of the committee that will convince them that this is one of the most important changes that has been proposed to the present law. I have the evidence, and I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Man-AHAN) asks unanimous consent that this section be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC, 8. That any person, including the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any vessel, who shall bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall attempt, by himself or through another, to bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall conceal or harbor, or attempt to conceal or harbor, or assist or abet another to conceal or harbor in any place, including any building, vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle, any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector or not lawfully entitled to enter or to reside within the United States under the terms of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, for each and every alien so landed or brought in.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to estable out.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILson] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I do so just to ask the chairman of the committee a question. In the criminal code in the act to codify and amend the penal laws of the United States, by section 335 it is provided that "all offenses which may be pun-ishable by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year shall be deemed felonies, and all others shall be deemed misdemeanors.'

In this act, in this section, and in several other sections you fix the penalty at not less than six months or more than two nx the penalty at not less than six months or more than two years, and you define the offense as a misdemeanor. That is in contravention of this former act. Why not strike out the word "misdemeanor," so that it would conform to the criminal code? Mr. BURNETT. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. WILSON of Florida. To describe the offense not as a misdemeanor, but simply fix the punishment.

Mr. BURNETT. After the word "shall" strike out the words "be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," and also strike out the word "and," so that it will read, "shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Precisely; because the criminal code fixes what is a felony and what is a misdemeanor.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman has the code there? Mr. WILSON of Florida. Yes; I have it in my hand.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman read the provision? Mr. WILSON of Florida. Yes. I read from section 335.

All offenses which may be punished by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year shall be deemed felonies, and all other offenses shall be deemed misdemeanors.

All offenses which may be punishable by death or imprisonment exceeding one year shall be deemed felonies. All others are misdemeaners.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to the amendment. suggest, in view of what the gentleman from Florida has said, that after the word "shall," in line 8, we strike out all down to and including "and," in line 9, striking out the words "be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and," on page 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, lines 4 and 5, after the word "act," in line 4, strike out the words "shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and."

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, let me state that this language in the bill simply makes a misdemeanor of something which may be a felony under the judicial code.

Mr. CANTOR. We have the perfect right in this bill to make it a misdemeanor, notwithstanding the code.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I do not disagree with the gentle-man. I am simply trying to state that this Congress has determined what shall be a felony and what shall be a misdemeanor, by the punishment prescribed, in the act revising the criminal Why change it here?

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman realizes that he seeks to amend the clause which imposes punishment on a sailor who conceals a stowaway, for instance. Now, that is in reality a pretty moderate offense to be called a felony, even by implica-The section which the gentleman seeks to amend deals entirely with the question of smuggling in aliens.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I am not responsible for the punishment which is fixed by the bill. I simply say that when you call this a misdemeanor you call it something that the Criminal Code says may be a felony.

Mr. GARDNER. There is some deprivation of the rights of citizenship which goes with a felony.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Yes.
Mr. GARDNER. Does not the gentleman think it is rather an academic proposition to make this a felony when the section is designed to stop a sailor helping a stowaway on the one extreme and a steamship company from landing a boatload at some unauthorized port on the other?

Mr. WILSON of Florida. It may be academic, but I am simply calling attention to the fact that it is contrary to the provisions of the Criminal Code.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is really academic, because if you strike out the language proposed to be stricken out, it will hardly make sense. If you object to the word "misdemeanor," why should you not substitute the word "offense," so that it will make sense?

Mr. GARDNER. It will read-

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed Senate bill 4010, to authorize the Tug River and Kentucky Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near the mouth of Blackberry Creek, in Pike County, Ky., in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on division (demanded by Mr. WILson of Florida) there were-ayes 6, noes 27.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am opposed to the bill and I will oppose any amendment to the bill that does not make it a better bill. There are many good provisions of law contained in the bill, and if they could be separated from the objectionable sections I could support it, but I can not support the bill with certain provisions which it contains. I wish to refer to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, which directly affects this bill, because it relates to the coming into this country of foreigners to compete with our laborers. The gentleman read something about the high wages paid in Canada. I am not positive, but I am quite certain that he quoted the wages paid in Canada during harvest time, and for no other time of the year. I have in my possession at my office the railway statistics of Canada and in the United States, and he undoubtedly quotes from statistics of 1912 in showing the high wages paid in Canada. The railroad wages over there for 1912 were $10.77 per week, as against $14.45 for labor on the railroads of the United States. What is true about railway employment is true about employment on the farm both in Canada and in the United States.

Some gentlemen have said in this debate that no industry in this country has yet been injured or factory closed down on account of the new tariff law. I want to call attention to the importations for October and November, 1913, as compared with the importations during those two months of the previous year. They are complete for October and November. Your President and my President, President Wilson, said in a speech made by him that he would injure no legitimate industry. He has injured the agricultural industry of this country, perhaps uncon-

Let me call your attention to what he has done and what you have done. In 1912 there were imported during the months of October and November 4,200 bushels of oats. In 1913, October and November, there were imported 7,657,000 bushels. Let me make that a little more plain, so that a foreigner can understand A carload of oats is about 1,000 bushels. Therefore, in October and November, 1912, there were imported into this country from Canada, and no other country, four carloads of oats. In October and November, 1913, there were imported into the country 7,657 carloads, or a train 54 miles long. Do you believe that will have an effect on the price of oats raised on the farms of this country?

The other day corn dropped in the markets of Chicago 6 cents a bushel. Six cents a bushel on the corn in the hands of the people of this country on that day amounted to $200,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the price of oats in October and November, 1912, and what was the price in 1913?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oats were 14 cents per bushel lower in 1913 than they were in 1912, but there is every evidence, my friend, that if it were not for these large importations under your freetrade measure the farmer would have received a better price for his oats in 1913 than he did during October and November, 1912.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to call attention to the fact that the new tariff law has affected a legitimate industrythe agricultural industry. Statistics are available on imports and exports for the months of October and November, 1913, in detail, and comparing them with figures for the same months of 1912 reveal startling results. I also have the total imports and exports for the month of December, to which I will refer

During the months of October and November, 1912, 251,290 bushels of corn were imported, valued at $136,363, whereas for the same months of 1913, under the Underwood free-trade bill, 2,105,902 bushels of corn were imported, valued at $1,560,683; 71,454 head of cattle were imported during the months of October and November, 1912, valued at $1,408,201, whereas during the months of October and November, 1913, under free trade, 253,757 head were imported, valued at $6,704,990. striking illustration of the injury inflicted upon the farmer by the enactment of this free-trade measure is the increase in the importation of oats. In October and November, 1912, but 4,645 bushels, valued at $2,238, were imported, while for the same months of the year 1913 7,657,101 bushels were imported, valued at $2,608,783. Breadstuffs, which means wheat and flour, the value of imports for the months of October and November, 1912, amounted to $2,398,405, whereas during the months of October and November, 1913, the value of bread-stuffs imported amounted to $7,529,558.

It will undoubtedly be recalled that a short time ago the Secretary of the Department of Commerce made an announcement with much pride that our exports were increasing more rapidly than our imports. In other words, that our balance of trade was on the gain. We now wonder whether or not the same gentleman will point with pride to the latest available figures, the imports and exports for the month of December.

They are as follows:

Imports.	December, 1913.	December, 1912.
Free. Dutiable.	$117, 339, 147 66, 395, 589	$90,051,367 64,044,077
Total	183, 732, 736	154, 095, 444
Exports. Balance of trade.	233, 488, 512 49, 755, 776	250, 315, 807 96, 220, 363

Sixty-three and nine-tenths per cent of the imports for December, 1913, were duty free. The above table shows that our exports for December, 1913, as compared with December, 1912, have fallen off over $17,000,000, and at the same time our imports have increased over $29,000,000. Approximately half our balance of trade has been lost.

Our good President said that "We must whet our wits." This foreign competition may whet the wits of the voters. He also made a statement to the effect that he would hang higher than Haman anyone who would have the audacity to turn away their employees and close their doors and blame it on the effect of the tariff. We have heard something of "the new freedom." It seems to me to be a new freedom from work, and I fear it will prove disastrous to the people of the United States. You may like it, but I do not.

Again, I have here a clipping from New York dated January I. The headline is "Tariff cuts butter cost." The article is a short one, and I will read it:

The influx of foreign butter from all parts of the world, due to the reduction of the tariff from 5 to 2½ cents a pound, has caused a decline in the New York wholesale price of 10 cents a pound since the first of in the New York wholesale price of 10 cents a point the year.

Butter has been coming to this city from as far off as Australia by way of San Francisco. Three hundred thousand pounds from that country have been laid down here within the last two or three weeks. Butter has also been shipped from Argentina, Denmark, and Siberia.

To-day the best-grade butter was sciling at 20½ to 27 cents a pound wholesale. The American demand for butter has caused a rise of 2 to 3 cents a pound in some of the foreign markets.

It is admitted that the price of butter in this country will be kept in the future at a lower average level than before.

the consumer has not yet received the benefit of this reduction of the price of butter and that the retail price in this city is practically the same as during the past couple of months, but the producer is the man who suffers by the reduction in price.

The New York Times of to-day, which I have here in my possession, on page 6, has the following startling headlines: "Three hundred and twenty-five thousand men unemployed in the city of New York"—the most of whom have families and homes in that city.

Do you gentlemen believe that these conditions can continue long before the entire country will keenly feel and know the result of the greatly increased importations from foreign countries employing cheap labor, cheaper by far than the labor employed here, which could not have resulted except through your freetrade tariff law?

You claim that your aim was to lower the cost of living in The first effect of this law is to displace employthis country. ment and furnish employment abroad in the production of articles offered to us for consumption. You have robbed the American laboring man of his income by taking away from him employment belonging to him, which you have given to foreigners in foreign countries. You must, sooner or later, admit the error of your ways. Nothing is cheap to a man who has no purchasing power. Nothing is dear when he can easily obtain the money with which to buy it. It is a true saying that-

Where there is employment there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food, but greater than that, prior to that, and of still greater value, is the blessing of being able to buy food by honest and respectable employment.

In your efforts to lower prices you have overlooked the fundamental and primary fact that the cost of living depends upon the employment given and the employee's power to exchange the sweat of his brow for the necessaries and comforts of life.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the patriotic sentiments expressed here during this discussion concerning the influence of European immigration upon this country. In fact, we are all of alien ancestry, and it is not for us to repudiate that ancestry or its part in our country's history. Far be it from me to question the statement expressed here that the Civil War was won by immigrants and their immediate ancestors. My own father and five uncles were in that war, two wounded at Gettysburg, and they were of a race that left Europe because of oppression.

We are all of the same race here—Americans—equally in-terested in our country's welfare, present and future; and any effort to raise standards of citizenship is for the benefit of that country, for the welfare of our children, and for those who come to us from across the water.

I doubt not that every Member has received protests against the passage of this bill, instigated, as we are advised, by grasping steamship companies; but we should not be carried away by sentiment nor be clubbed into voting against a bill because of a provision requiring immigrants to read 40 words in their own or any other language they may select. It is not an unreasonable request that they be able to read 40 words in some language. The bill excepts from this literacy test certain members of families now living abroad who desire to join relatives here, and, generally speaking, it is fair in terms.

A brief analysis of the character of immigration which came our shores in 1913 is illuminating. The total reached 1,197,892, of which number 254,825 came from Austria-Hungary, 265,542 from Italy and adjacent islands, and 291,040 from Russia. These figures total 811,507 people, or more than twothirds, who came from the three countries named. three other countries which have good educational facilities and whose people have contributed to the development of my home State, we find that in 1913 Germany sent 34,329, or less than 3 per cent of the total; Norway, 8,527, or less than 1 per cent; and Sweden, 17,202, or slightly over 1 per cent; while Turkey, the land of Mohammed and ignorance, sent 38,083, or more than all Germany and about as many as Ireland, Scotland, and Wales combined. Switzerland, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, and France, all countries of good educational opportunities, have also placed their impress upon the citizenship of this country and upon my home State. Yet these five countries together in 1913 contributed only 34,562, or less than the Turks; whereas Italy, with its 265,542, gave us 8 immigrants for every arrival from the combined 5 northern countries last named.

Practically equalling all arrivals from Germany, Norway, Sweden, England, and Ireland combined, southern Italy sent 1,471,659 immigrants to us within the decade 1899–1910. Of these Italians only 46 per cent could read or write, over three-fourths of a million of illiterates from Italy alone. By contrast, only one Scandinavian arrival out of 240, or 0.4 per cent, could not read or write, a better average than is possessed by any State.

We also learn from the official reports that only 19,938 immigrants, or less than 2 per cent of those asking for admission in 1913 could legally be refused on the ground that they were criminals, insane, degenerates, or other objectionable characters prohibited from entering by present law; yet the New York insane hospitals' report for 1913 states that 41.9 per cent, or nearly one-half of all such inmates were aliens.

or nearly one-half, of all such inmates were aliens.

It is doubtful if this bill will materially reduce immigration to this country, because unconscionable steamship companies, represented by unscrupulous agents abroad, will continue to hold out deceptive inducements and will continue to dump thousands and hundreds of thousands of helpless, misinformed, and deluded mortals onto our shores. A word of warning against such immigration is sounded by the decrease of 25 per cent in our proportionate rural population within the last 30 years, materially reducing its proportionate agricultural production, while only 2 per cent of the enormous annual increase in our population through immigration ultimately reach the farm or become food producers. The remaining 98 per cent is thrown directly into competition with hundreds of thousands of men in factories, trades, and other walks of life; men who are now idle and whose numbers out of work in one single industry had passed the million mark on January 1, 1914.

Mr. Chairman, we compel our own children to go to school in order that they may become good citizens. We seek to raise the standard of literacy, of intelligence, and of citizenship through education by the State for the benefit of the State, and any reasonable bill which will require the illiterates of southern Europe to make some slight effort toward their own improvement as a condition of entrance to our country, in my judgment, ought to be passed.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, since the opening of this debate I have listened with very great attention to the discussion indulged in by the gentlemen who appear as the proponents of this measure in order to determine whether any plausible argument could be advanced in favor of that feature of section 3 of the bill, the offensive literacy test.

We read in the report of the committee that the plan of subjecting aliens to the reading test has been discussed by Congress and has been before the country for many years. In view of the time and thought and thorough investigation that have been given the subject, one would naturally expect at this late date to hear in the course of discussion some sound and sensible reasoning, if any could be offered, in confirmation of the attitude taken by those who seem to have consecrated their congressional careers to excluding immigrants from our shores.

So far, at least, the discussion has failed to produce conviction, and inevitably so, for you may argue the question from every conceivable standpoint, and in the final analysis you can not escape the conclusion that the one great factor that has produced the marvelous development of this country has been the brawn and sinew of the army of immigrants who have come to our shores to assist in the upbuilding of this mighty and majestic Republic.

The votaries of this proposition to apply a literacy test assert with animated emphasis that the ability to read English or some other language or dialect is a sound and healthy standard to apply to the admission of the alien.

Nothing could be more unjust, injudicious, or unreasonable. In the process of this country's development during the period of 100 years, thousands and tens of thousands of aliens unable to read any language have knocked for entry at our doors, and no one can gainsay the fact that these multitudes from across the seas and from contiguous territory on the north have contributed wonderfully to the growth and advancement of American ideals and American institutions.

Whenever the advantages that this country has received through the admission of the hosts of immigrants who have entered our ports in the last half century are recited, the advocates of this measure are accustomed to nod their heads in assent, but they draw a distinction, however, between the older and the newer immigration in the attempt to justify their position. Yet the very same aversion that is manifested toward the newcomers of the present was extended to the older immigrants more than half a century ago by the pessimistic prophets of that day and generation, who raised the woeful wail that our institutions—aye, our very fabric of government—were at the mercy of immigrant hordes and clans that were coming from the tyrannical Governments of Europe.

In view of the fact that American enterprise has been stimulated and American genius quickened by the uniform assistance of the stout and sturdy manhood from foreign shores, is it possible that we have reached the point where anyone will declare that a failure or refusal to adopt this literacy test must shake our faith in America's future? I think not. Our economic development has not yet come to an end; it has only begun, and it is beyond the power of anyone to conceive the tremendous possibilities that yet remain in store. The harvest obtainable from the cultivation of American soil has not yet been exhausted; neither has the earth beneath us yielded up all of the untold wealth that is stored in its bowels.

The purpose of this proposed law, we are told, is to offer a safeguard against the continuous influx of undesirables. The quality of our present-day immigration, as appears in the reports of the Immigration Commission, does not disclose any proof that the great majority of foreigners who are coming are undesirable. The commission states that—undesirable. The commission states that—

The present movement is not recruited in the main from the lowest economic and social strata of European populations. In European countries, as in the United States, the poorest and the least desirable element in the population, from an economic as well as a social standpoint, is found in the larger cities, and as a rule such cities furnish comparatively few emigrants. Neither do the average or typical emigrants of to-day represent the lowest in the economic and social scale even among the classes from which they come, a circumstance attributable to both natural and artificial causes. In the first place, emigrating to a strange and distant country, although less of an undertaking than formerly, is still a scrious and relatively difficult matter, requiring a degree of courage and resourcefulness not possessed by weaklings of any class. This natural law in the main regulated the earlier European emigration, whether or not desirable as a whole, nevertheless represents the stronger and better element of the particular class from which it is drawn.

It goes without saying that we can not continue to advance industrially without the aid of human hands that are anxious and willing to work. The burden of all our upbuilding as a nation must be borne to a great extent by the newcomer to our shores, who seeks only an opportunity to earn his bread in the sweat of his brow.

Complaint is made that enormous sums of money are taken away from this country through repatriation, for the reports of the Immigration Commission state that—

At least one-third of all European immigrants who come to the United States eventually return to Europe.

Granted that there is a flow of money through this channel to the Old World. Every dollar of it represents money honestly earned, and for every dollar so taken an equivalent, and more than an equivalent in production was left behind from which this country is enriched and not impoverished. Apart from the advantages so rendered to American production, the possession of this wealth in the pockets of returning immigrants leads, in the language of the Immigration Commission, to the adoption of a higher standard of living at home:

tion of a higher standard of living at home:

The repatriates, as a rule, return with amounts of money which seem large in the surroundings from which they emigrated. Usually, also, their sojourn abroad has made them more enterprising and ambitious and created in them a desire for better things than those to which they were formerly accustomed. This desire usually leads to the adoption of a higher standard of living, improved methods of labor in agriculture and other pursuits. In several parts of Europe visited by members of the commission the dwellings of the returned emigrants are conspicuously better than those of their neighbors, and their economic status as a whole is higher. Their example, too, is often emulated by their neighbors, and in consequence the tone of whole communities is frequently elevated.

If this statement made in the reports of the Imprignation

If this statement made in the reports of the Immigration Commission is true, and no one will deny that it is, is it not to be concluded that the foreigner while remaining in America has bettered his moral and social condition? And if the moral standard of the repatriate has been heightened so as to elevate the tone of the community to which he has returned, how can it justly be maintained that those who remain here are incapable of assimilation?

Ability to read is not and can not be regarded as a test of capacity for labor. On the contrary, sturdy manhood is the only test, a sound mind in a sound body, and a moral sense whose development must lift its possessor always to a higher plane of living and doing.

Many of the immigrants who come to our shores are illiterate, but very soon after their arrival they realize the opportunities that this country affords in the matter of acquiring education. In spite of the great influx of immigrants arriving in the United States, Americanization can be effected, and is, in truth, effected to-day by the splendid educational opportunities that this country offers. The children of immigrants are in many cases the unconscious agents of this transformation, for the influence of the school and library upon them-which is often transmitted to the parents—drives out many racial tendencies that otherwise might retard assimilation. It has been well said by a prominent educator that-

Illiteracy is a mere accident that may affect a family in one generation but be conspicuously absent from succeeding generations. Thousands of our best people are descended from illiterate ancestors.

The present attempt is not the first that has been made to adopt a literacy test. President Cleveland vetoed a law of this character, and in expressing his views upon it, in 1897, de-

Clared—

The ability to read and write, as required in this bill, in and of itself affords, in my opinion, a misleading test of contented industry, and supplies unsatisfactory evidence of desirable citizenship or a proper apprehension of the benefits of our institutions. If any particular element of our illiterate immigration is to be feared for other causes than illiteracy, these causes should be dealt with directly instead of making illiteracy the pretext for exclusion to the detriment of other illiterate immigrants, against whom the real cause of complaint can not be alleged. It is safer to admit a hundred thousand immigrants who, though unable to read and write, seek among us a home and opportunity to work than to admit one of those unruly agitators who can not only read and write, but delights in arousing by inflammatory speech the illiterate and peacefully inclined to discontent.

Again, in the Sixty-second Congress a bill containing the literacy test was passed, but was given a crushing blow by the veto of President Taft, who denounced it as

A bill which in its chief provision violates a principle that ought to be upheld in dealing with our immigration.

No one who deals with the foreigner can fail to realize his common sense, a quality so essential to individual success, though not synonymous with education. Patiently and uncomplainingly he does the basic, ancillary work which the older immigrant refuses to do, a service which history shows has been done by one wave of immigration after another.

The Germans and the Irish, the French Canadians, and the Scandinavians, who constituted the older immigration, and who were pointed out in their day as unfit to measure up to American standards and ideals, have long since outlived this uncharitable imputation. They have proved their worth in the great task of upbuilding the structure of a Republic, and, be it said to their everlasting credit, this Nation would never have achieved the greatness it enjoys to-day were it not for the influence exerted upon it by these sturdy races.

The later-day immigration has directed to our shores the afflicted peoples from Poland, Russia, and the Balkan Peninsula; and the sons of sunny Italy have also crossed the sea in search of new fields of endeavor. Many of these races have their abodes in the State in which I live, and, I am glad to say that they are honest, patriotic, and law-abiding citizens and that their arrival has been of benefit and not an injury. Though many of them may be wanting in education and, perhaps, in-different to ceremonial requirement, they are, nevertheless, patient, hardworking, generous, intelligent, and firm and constant in family affections.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of this bill, and accordingly I shall vote against it. I believe that a policy which opens the doors of this Nation to receive the patriotic, moral, brave, and enterprising sons and daughters of the downtrodden races of the Old World, with no educational test to hamper or prevent their admission, embodies a spirit of righteousness and accords with the ancient conviction that this country is the home of the free, where the child of every creed and every clime can breathe our free air and participate in our free institutions.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Since there has been a good deal of further discus-sion of the literacy test, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent the following Members were given leave to extend remarks in the Record: Mr. Austin, Mr. Har-RISON, and Mr. RAKER.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed forthwith.

The motion was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States any alien afflicted with idlocy, insanity, imbecility, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of the provisions of this section. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any allen so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25 for each and every violation of this provision. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States by naturalization, as provided in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that these disab

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amend-

The Clerk read as follows .

Page 16, line 14, after the words "United States" insert the words "either from a foreign country or from the insular possessions of the United States."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment suggested by the Secretary of Labor for the purpose of extending the responsibility of steamship companies who bring diseased persons from foreign ports to the United States so that it will include steamship companies which bring diseased aliens from our insular possessions to the United States. It is pointed out by the Secretary that the coming of aliens coastwise from the insular possessions, particularly the Asiatic line from the Philippine Islands, was becoming a very grave matter.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.
Mr. TOWNER. Would that include the transportation of soldiers who are sick and going back to their homes in this country?

Mr. GARDNER. Not unless they were aliens, and they would have to be afflicted with idlocy, insanity, epilepsy, or tuberculosis in any form, and that fact must also have been ascertainable before the diseased person left the foreign port.

Mr. MOORE. What bearing would this have upon immigrants coming in from the Canal Zone?

Mr. GARDNER. The whole law applies to them, anyway. Mr. MOORE. This amendment is not directed at them espe-

Mr. GARDNER. No. I want to ask unanimous consent later on to revert and make an amendment in that connection.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think that soldiers the United States Army ought to be excepted?

Mr. GARDNER. To tell the truth, Mr. Chairman, I have not thought of that, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the discussion with the gentleman from New York a w moments ago-

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I hope these discussions will be confined to the section, and that we will not go out into a discussion about somebody's city or country any more. I shall object to anything that is not germane to the section.

Mr. MOORE. Why does the gentleman not raise that objection on his own side?

Mr. BURNETT. We have had this back and forth on each

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle] in a running debate with myself a few moments ago was explaining why there were so many unemployed people in New York City, saying that they gathered there from the various States in the Union. In this connection I wish to read the following letter:

EDWARD HORVATH LABOR AGENCY, 124 EAST THIRD STREET, New York City, October 4, 1913.

S. E. & H. L. SHEPERD CO.,

Rockport, Me.

GENTLEMEN: Foreign laborers are now available in this city for less wages than you can secure men for in your State.

Are you in need of any? If so, we can offer for immediate shipment any number of them of any desired nationality.

Trusting to hear from you, we are,

Very truly, yours,

M. Engel, Manager.

Mr. CANTOR. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that is not an authorized labor agency at all. We are familiar with that letter. This is an old chestnut, 2 years old.

Mr. AUSTIN. And that is the way you answer this letter not 2 years old but written and sent out 4 months ago.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] spoke about the number of people that are employed at this time, and I wish to read in that connection from the report of the president and secretary of the finance committee of the United Charities

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I object. This is not relative or germane to the discussion of this bill. We have gone far affeld in the discussion of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I will notify the gentleman that I shall finish my speech or he will be compelled to keep a quorum here the rest of the evening. I do not propose to be shut off in this way after gentlemen on his side have had a chance to make speeches.

Mr. BURNETT. Men on both sides of the aisle have had a chance to talk, and I object; and if the gentleman will keep a quorum here the rest of the day I will be very much obliged

Mr. AUSTIN. I am the first victim of the gentleman's order, after I have started my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed in order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to be given an opportunity to answer a speech on that side.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman may finish his speech. I withdraw the objection for the present, but give notice that hereafter I shall jusist upon it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I shall renew the objection unless I shall have the right to answer the gentleman. He may quote something pertaining to my city which I may believe requires an answer.

Mr. AUSTIN. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] to the fact that he is the very man who provoked this discussion by an assault upon the South and an attack upon its industrial conditions.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Tennessee, of course, never said anything about the North and never said anything about the South. Of course! He never did.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman referred to peonage in the

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 17, after the word "act," strike out the words "because unable to read."

Mr. MOORE, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, because it appears that in certain of the exempted classes provided for in section 3, this would work a hardship, as, for instance, in the case of a relative who is entitled to come over under the exemption provided for in a preceding paragraph. I submit this to the committee as a fair proposition, and believe the words ought to go out.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman last year submitted exactly the same proposition, and so did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath].

It is true that a year ago the immigration bill as it came from the first conference inadvertently penalized vessels which should bring over aliens unable to read, even though they belonged to the excepted classes. You yourself, if I recollect than a parent or a relative should bring them over here; is it rightly, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] pointed not better that that person who brings them here, that takes out our mistake. Therefore in our second conference with the Senate we amended the clause so as to penalize vessels for bringing over "any alien excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read." I think the amendment

3 of this act because unable to read." I think the amendment was suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] or else by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall it, so I question whether it was at my request. My reason for offering this amendment is that in the case of a grandfather or a grandchild or a wife or a husband this might make a very serious obstacle to their coming in.

Mr. GARDNER. By the wording it can not be, if the gentleman will permit me— Mr. MOORE. There must be proof somewhere on the other side that there is an inability to read.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes. Mr. MOORE. And the test must apply in the case of one who would come under the exemption clause and desire to join relatives here

Mr. GARDNER. Those who are exempted under clause 3 are not affected by the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE. But I submit they must prove on the other side, else they have no opportunity to come at all to join their relatives here. They must prove there their ability to read. To whom? You penalize the people who brought them and-

Mr. GARDNER. Precisely; we penalize the steamship companies for bringing over defective aliens.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman will admit that if one of these relatives came to the port of New York and there proved to the satisfaction of the immigration officer that he or she was entitled to admission into this country under the exemption clause that there would be an admission into the country and that there would be no penalty against anybody; but that opportunity so to prove the admission into this country must now be made somewhere, in "darkest Russia," or somewhere in some country in Europe, and the immigrant has no opportunity to come and join his relatives at all.

Mr. GARDNER. That is true in regard to other immigration-exclusion provisions. We penalize the steamship companies for bringing over diseased aliens if it could have been found out abroad that they were diseased. We penalize them for un-necessarily bringing over men and women who can not land here. We believe it is merciful to stop such people at the other end, and the only way we see to stop them is by penalizing the steamship companies that sell them tickets.

Now, take the case which the gentleman suggests, of an aged grandfather who wishes to accompany or join an alien grandson who knows how to read. He can furnish exactly the same evidence to the steamship company when he seeks to purchase his ticket as he can furnish the inspector in New York when he seeks the admission of the excepted alien.

Mr. MOORE. Does not that paragraph fine the grandson who undertakes to bring in his grandfather under those circumstances?

Mr. GARDNER. No.

Mr. MOORE. It imposes a penalty upon him as well as the steamship company or any person who assists—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that it would be exceedingly unjust to the immigrant to have it any other way. This merely imposes upon the steamship company the burden of ascertaining the admissibility of the immigrant before the immigrant is brought to this side and to save that immigrant, perhaps, from being deported after examination on this side. Now, is it not fair and just to the immigrant himself that the ship that brings him here should have the burden laid upon it to ascertain his admissibility before they bring the immigrant here who may then have to be deported?

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for a question? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr.

BURNETT] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. I have tried to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the language here, which indicates that it is "any person." I am getting away from the steamship company, if the gentleman pleases, and I call his attention to the sentence beginning on line 7, page 14:

That it shall be unlawful for any such person to pring to any port of the United States.

That is the grandson trying to bring the grandfather in; that is the husband trying to bring the wife in. That is the person who is penalized there, and not the company.

Mr. BURNETT. Suppose that some other individual other than a parent or a relative should bring them over here; is it the responsibility of bringing them, should ascertain on the other side the admissibility, rather than to ascertain it after they get over here? And if that person fails to ascertain it there, that is the person who ought to be penalized for bringing the inadmissible alien. It seems to me, in taking either horn of the dilemma, it is a fair thing to the alien to make the person who brings him here, even if he is a relative, or the steamship or transportation company, take the burden. If they assume the responsibility of bringing an alien here, let them have the burden of proving he is an admissible alien, and, if not, let them be subjected to the penalty. The purpose of this provision is to prevent the violation of law.

Mr. MOORE. Does not the provision force the person in the United States to go to the steamship company over there to make the proof that is necessary? Who else is there on the other side to go to?

Mr. BURNETT. Not necessarily. It imposes upon the steamship company the necessity of finding it out somehow, but it does not impose upon the relative the task of going over there and furnishing it, but the steamship company or the person responsible for bringing the alien here should find out if he is admissible, and it is justice to the alien that it should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore].

The amendment was rejected,

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 16, in line 11: After the word "company," in line 11, strike out "other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because I desire to keep out not only those that we prohibit the steamship companies from bringing in under this section, but also desire to keep out those that railways may bring in. This section 9 provides the following:

That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company (other than railway lines) entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity, imbecility, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contaglous disease—

By this exception, "other than railway lines," we permit railroads to bring into our country the very people that we properly prohibit steamship companies from bringing in. Now, I maintain that these people should be excluded, and we do exclude them from entering our ports, and I do not know of any reason why we should permit others to come in by rail. The chairman of this committee may enlighten me on that point, but I do not myself know of any reason why we should accept these people who thus desire to enter our border by rail when we prohibit their coming by sail.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the law for many years has stood as it stands now. I can not, without preparation, explain the matter as clearly as I should like. This section was devised solely for the protection of the immigrant. It was devised solely for the protection of the immigrant. It was found that many an immigrant was brought here by a steam-ship company on the chance that he might be admitted. Many an immigrant paid his fare, sold his household goods, and left his home in Europe, only to be turned back at New York. In order to discourage this recklessness on the part of steamship companies we penalized them for bringing inadmissible aliens over provided that the inadmissibility was of a pattern which over, provided that the inadmissibility was of a nature which could be discovered before the alien started. The result has been that steamship companies always subject immigrants to a rigid inspection before they sell them tickets.

Now, the gentleman proposes to apply this same principle to railroad lines from Canada and Mexico. In the first place, there is here no necessity to protect the immigrant from in-

The domicile which the Canadian is leaving is not in central Europe. It is probably not half a day's journey from the United States. No hardship results from his rejection. The railroad company has made no fat profit, after recklessly permitting some poor European to break up his home ties. injury has been done to the United States nor to any American citizen.

On the other hand, think of the vast impediment to travel if this amendment is adopted. The railroads would be obliged to retain an examining surgeon at every station of all interna-tional railroads, and each passenger must undergo an examination before he bought his ticket. An examination prior to the sale of a ticket is easy enough in Liverpool, for instance, but it is a very different matter when passengers are boarding trains at an endless succession of stations.

Moreover, many of the medical examinations in Canada are performed by our own officials, and trans-Atlantic aliens are passed through from Montreal to Chicago just exactly as they would be passed through from New York to Chicago.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Pow-ers] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I have been busily engaged with other matters and up to this time I have taken no part in this discussion.

There is just one contention of the opponents of this bill which I want to try to answer. It is their contention that the provisions of this Burnett bill reverses the historic policy of this Government in the matter of immigration. They say that this country for all these years has been the one spot on earth where the oppressed of every clime and country could look with hope, and that we have until now held out open arms to receive them.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that this Government from the time of its earliest existence down to now has never passed but one law encouraging immigration, and that was the law passed in 1864 encouraging contract labor. With that one exception the Congress of the United States has never put upon the statute books of this country a single law that has encouraged immigration. It is true that up to 1819 this country took no notice of immigrants at all. They came here as a matter of course. Up to that time we had no policy. In 1819 was passed the first law.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman is not made to the amendment. I stated a while ago that I would object.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is a member of the committee, is he not?

Mr. BURNETT. No.

Mr. MANN. He was in the last Congress, then. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to consume his five minutes. This is an exceptional case. He is addressing himself to the bill.

Mr. POWERS. I want to state, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] that I am discussing this measure, although not confining my remarks to the particular provision now pending. But heretofore I have not had an opportunity to discuss this bill at all. I have been looking after other matters in which my district is vitally concerned.

In 1819, as I said a moment ago, the first law was passed by Congress restricting immigration, and from that time down to now every law that we have had except one has been to restrict more and more the immigrants coming into this country.

This question was not agitated by the people of this country until 1835. From 1835 until 1860 there sprang up what is known as the Know-Nothing Party, and the question of foreign immigration was much before the country during that period. The great influx of immigrants coming here in 1849 and 1850 greatly accentuated this question, and the Know-Nothing Party had 43 Members of this House, 5 governors of the various States, and that many State legislatures. But it went out of existence without having accomplished anything so far as the restriction of immigration is concerned.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. POWERS. I yield with pleasure. Mr. SABATH. Why did that party go out of existence?

Can the gentleman explain?

Mr. POWERS. It went out of existence, I take it, because it did not have enough support to keep it alive. Another reason why it went out of existence was that the Civil War came on and the attention of the people was thereby diverted to other questions

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-NETT | moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That it shall be the mandatory and unqualified duty of every person, including owners, officers, and agents of vessels or transportation lines, other than those lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act, bringing an alien to any seaport or land border port of the United States to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers, and the failure of any such owner, officer, or agent to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be deemed a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, a pecuniary penalty of $1,000 shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owner, master, officer, or agent violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court. Mr. GARDNER, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hay). The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 12, after the words "other than those lines," insert or international bridges or toll roads other than those railway lines."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment suggested by the Secretary of Labor. The purpose is to enable him to exercise a greater control over the entry of aliens by international bridges and toll roads.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word or two about these amendments which were submitted by the Secretary of Labor. We received them only yesterday. The Committee on Labor. We received them only yesterday. Immigration is not responsible for the fact that we have had no meeting in which to discuss these suggestions.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Are you not accepting responsibility for these amendments by proposing them in this way?

Mr. GARDNER. Quite so.
Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. It is reasonable to expect you to accept responsibility for them?

Mr. GARDNER. A great many amendments that we were not sure enough about have not been presented.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whom does the gentleman include under " we"?

Mr. GARDNER. I did not yield, and I will ask both gentlemen to sit down. Mr. Chairman, the facts are these—I am not saying this as a criticism on anyone—the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, seven months ago, is not yet printed. Now, he is no more dilatory in that respect than his predecessor. Last year we did not get the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration until very late, indeed. I do not believe that it was Mr. Keefe's fault last year, nor do I believe that it is Mr. Caminetti's fault this year, but the circumstance is very embarrassing, for all that.

Mr. SABATH, Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GARDNER, Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Has not the gentleman the printed report here before him?

Mr. GARDNER. I have the proofs of part of the report, and only part of the report. I was in the office of Mr. Caminetti the other day and with my own eyes saw him correcting a part of the report. If the gentleman has the proofs of the whole of the report, it is more than I have seen. I am not criticizing Mr. Caminetti. His report comes no later than did those of his predecessor. Probably Congress does not allow the bureau sufficient money for clerical expenses. I can remember that in days gone by, when the immigrant fund was separate, we used to get the advance sheets of the commissioners' report in September; at least I think that I can remember using the advance sheets of the report for 1905 early in the autumn.

The corrections suggested by the Department of Labor for our bill did not come to us until yesterday morning. Every amendment which I am offering was selected by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnert] and myself after a number of hours' work, as being an amendment which clearly ought to be accepted, and an amendment to which no one could reasonably take exception.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes. Mr. MOORE. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's argument, but I understand he is offering these as committee amendments.

Mr. GARDNER. As amendments that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnerr] and I have both examined and that we the Commissioner General of Immigration marked believe to be indubitably wise suggestions on the part of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. MOORE. I raise the question now, because a number of amendments have been offered here that have had the appearance of being committee amendments.
Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. There having been no meeting of the committee, want to know if they are offered as committee amendments.

Mr. GARDNER. I have offered very few amendments, except those suggested by the Secretary of Labor at an hour so late that it was quite impossible for the chairman of the Immigration Committee to call us together.

Mr. MOORE. Are they offered in consequence of the receipt of a printed report from the Secretary or the commissioner?

Mr. GARDNER. No; these suggestions were contained in a letter addressed to the Speaker. I am told that the printing of the letter is held up so as to permit some changes in the

Mr. MOORE. I understand the gentleman has the sympathy of a majority of the Members on that side, but it would have been fair to let us know where these amendments came from and if we are at liberty on this side to use the information which the gentleman has.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is absolutely at liberty to do so. In fact, I handed this carbon copy of the letter from the Secretary of Labor to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in connection with some remarks he was making.

Mr. MOORE. I have not seen that letter, but I have seen a report marked "confidential," and I wanted to know whether I would be at liberty to refer to that report, as the gentleman seems to be referring to a letter.

Mr. GARDNER. The letter is public. It was submitted to the Speaker of the House yesterday.

Mr. BURNETT and Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts rose. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Alabama is on the same side of this question as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] who has just spoken. He is in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Alabama is in favor of the amendment, is it in order for the Chair to recognize him after there has been one speech already in favor of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the right of recognition, and the Chair exercises it by recognizing the gentleman from

Alabama

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Is it the custom followed by the Chair to recognize a Member who is opposed to an amendment after there has been a speech in favor of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell whether a gentleman rising on the floor is for an amendment or against it.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. If the Chair can say that, I am content. I think the Chair can tell and that he knows.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the custom, generally, for the Chair to recognize the chairman of the committee who has charge of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] said, I want to call attention to the fact that the transportation lines, the railroad companies, are required to bring the allens from such ports and land them as designated by the immigration officers. It seems to me that this is a wise amendment, because it is not only applicable to the railroad companies but to the bridge companies that allow them to come over. Then it provides that there may be arrangements made by which they may come and go. That is all that it is. The existing law requires the railroad companies to bring them from designated ports and land them at designated places, and this amendment requires the same thing of the bridge company.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask the chairman of the committee the same question that I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts. Does this suggestion come from the Secretary of Labor in such a letter as we may use it publicly?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. Mr. MOORE. There has been laid before me a report of dential," and I wanted to know if we were at liberty to refer to that report. The gentleman is offering amendments as the result of that report.

Mr. BURNETT. This is in response to a request made by me two or three months ago to the Secretary of Labor. We sent him our bill and asked him for comments. It is not a confidential report.

Mr. MOORE. Then it would be no breach of confidence if should make reference to the commissioner's report?

Mr. BURNETT. No. He said that Members of Congress might use it on the floor if they were disposed to do so, but it was not to be given out to the press.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman will understand that the document I have been reading from is a typewritten copy of a letter sent to the Speaker of the House yesterday by the Secretary of Labor,
Mr. MOORE. It is not the letter which the Secretary of Labor sent in reference to the Asiatic question?

Mr. GARDNER. It was a communication under Rule XLI of the House, sent in response to the request for information made by the chairman of the committee of the House, and of course it must be transmitted to the Speaker. If it had not been that it was held up to make some change in the figures in the tables, it would have been already printed as a document.

Mr. MOORE. My question, and I would like to have it made a matter of record, applies to this situation. The members of the committee generally have not seen the letter, nor has the letter been before the committee, so the amendments that gen-tlemen are offering as the result of their reading the letter from the Secretary received by the Speaker yesterday is upon their own motion and without any concurrence on the part of the

Mr. GARDNER. No; we really thought it would be performing a service to pick out these amendments which the Secretary suggested that looked to us as clearly right beyond dispute, and try to get the bill in the best possible form before it went to the Senate, leaving as little as possible in the way of corrections to be made by the Senate.

Mr. MOORE. One further question. In view of the peculiar complexion of this Committee on Immigration, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, who speaks for the gentleman from Alabama, whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfoole] have been conferred with upon this letter any more than I have?
Mr. GARDNER. Merely because there was not time.
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Who does the gentleman mean by "we"?

Mr. GARDNER. The chairman and myself.
Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.
Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question, and that is if he proposes to get this bill through to-night?

Mr. BURNETT. I hope so.

Mr. PAYNE. Without wishing to be impertinent, for I am in favor of the gentleman's bill, let me suggest to the gentleman if it would not be well to trust the common sense of the House as to the effect of such an amendment as this if put upon the bill, without going into so much elaboration and questioning of its origin with the Secretary of Labor, and all that kind of thing? It seems to me the House is intelligent enough to understand the amendment without so much comment. It seems to give gentlemen who want to attack this bill an opportunity to raise questions about it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore], who is always very fertile in resources, was never more so than he has been within the last few minutes, when he was inquiring so particularly about that letter from the Department of Labor. Now, I am not criticizing the gentleman at all; I admire the fertility of his genius and his facility of expression; but I would like a chance to vote on this important amendment, and I think I understand it. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York fails to note the welfare of 250,000 people who are affected by the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. They are not involved in this amendment; both the gentleman and I know that.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the fact that amendments are being offered on the other side, the result, apparently, of suggestions that have come from the Secretary of Labor during the last 24 hours, which have not been submitted to the Committee on Immigra-tion and Naturalization; and in view of the further fact that a confidential report of the Commissioner General of Immigration laid before the members of the committee, which they were sup-posed not to use, but which has been used by Members on the other side in the preparation of amendments which have been offered on this floor, I desire now to read a brief extract from a report of Mr. Caminetti, the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States and the right hand of the Secretary of Labor. In his report, dated July 1, 1913, in discussing the advisability of curtailing the immigration to the United States and of further regulating it, Commissioner General Caminetti says with regard to the literacy test:

We can not by law prevent our people from flocking to the cities, nor can we under the existing system, in order to overcome the same tendency in a large majority of immigrants, direct them after landing to certain localities where they may remain. We can, however, regulate their coming.

But how and in what way?

Some advocate the "illiteracy test," which, notwithstanding all that can be offered in its favor, has also, it must be conceded, its drawbacks.

So the Commissioner General of Immigration apparently is not in favor of the literacy test that we have voted into this bill. A little further on the Commissioner General amplifies this statement in this reference:

statement in this reference:

After all, manhood should be the test of admission and would constitute the ideal way of sifting immigration so as to admit none except altogether desirable allens with the requisite physical, mental, and moral qualifications.

As a rule the admitted aliens must, because of lack of knowledge of the English language and of existing conditions, earn their livelihood by manual labor. It is important, therefore, that they should be physically sound. In the bureau's judgment, the adoption of a physical test similar to that which recruits for the Army undergo would insure a suitable standard. The fact that more than 6,000 applicants during the past 12 months were rejected as physically unfit under the existing law, notwithstanding that the requirements thereof and the funds and facilities for its enforcement were wholly inadequate, indicates that the physical standard now prevailing is far below what it should be.

Irrespective of whether or not the illiteracy test is adopted, the standards of the law regarding physical and moral qualifications should be materially raised and the machinery for their enforcement extensively improved.

There is no educational test recommended in the report of the

There is no educational test recommended in the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, sent here with the approval of the Secretary of Labor. There is no suggestion that men and women desiring to obtain a haven here and to work out their existence here should be barred by reason of an educational test, but there is a suggestion, which is humane after all and which shows that those in the administrative capacity in this Government are coming to their senses upon this question, that after all "manhood" shall be the test and that there shall be only a physical, mental, and moral qualification. Hence we have voted into this bill, as I suspected some time ago, a provision restricting immigration by an educational test, which flies directly in the teeth of the recommendation of the Commissioner of Immigration and which flies also in the teeth of the suggestion of the Secretary of Labor. You have voted the literacy test into this bill, and voted it into the bill very much as you were about to vote the Asiatic question into this bill, against the wishes of your Secretary of State, in defiance of the wishes of your Commissioner General of Immigration and your own Secretary of Labor.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that he has misrepresented, no doubt unintentionally, the Secretary of Labor, who says:

I am not opposed to the incorporation in the law of the illiteracy test, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 11. That whenever he may deem such action necessary the Secretary of Labor may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, detail immigrant inspectors and matrons of the United States Immigration Service for duty on vessels carrying immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. On such voyages said inspectors and matrons shall remain in that part of the vessel where immigrant passengers are carried. It shall be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe such passengers during the voyage and report to the immigration authorities in charge at the port of landing any information of value in determining the admissibility of such passengers under the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States. It shall further be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe violations of the provisions of such laws and the violation of such provisions of the provisions of such laws and the violation of such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended, as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and report the same to the proper United States officials at ports of landing. Whenever the Secretary of Labor so directs a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service, detailed to the Immigration Service, not lower in rank than a passed assistant surgeon, shall be received and carried on any vessel transporting immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. Such surgeon shall be permitted to investigate and examine the condition of all immigrant and emigrant passengers in relation to any provisions of the laws regulating the immigration of allens into the United States and such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended, as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and shall immediately report any violation of said laws to the master or commanding officer of the vessel, and shall also report said violations to the Secretary of Labor within 24 hours after the arrival of the vessel at the port of entry in the United States. Such surgeon shall accompany the master or captain of the vessel in his visits to the sanitary officers of the ports of call during the voyage, and, should contagious or infectious diseases prevall at any port where passengers are received, he shall request all reasonable precautionary measures for the health of persons on board. Such surgeon, on arrival at ports of the United States, shall also, if requested by the examining board, furnish any information he may possess in regard to immigrants arriving on the vessel to which he has been detailed. While on duty such surgeons shall wear the prescribed uniform of their service and shall be provided with first-class accommodations on such vessel at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. For every violation of this section any person, including any transportation company owning or operating the vessel in which such violation occurs, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the next United States port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each and every day during which such violation continues, the term "violation" to include the refusal of any person having authority so to do to permit any such immigrant inspector, matron, or surgeon to be received on board such vessel, as provided in this section, and also the refusal of the master or commanding officer of any such vessel to permit the inspections and visits of any such surgeon, as provided in this section, and no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability of such fine or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determina

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read. The Clerk rend as follows:

On page 20, line 1, strike out all after the word "landing," down and including the word "passengers" in line 5, and substitute the to and including the word "passengers" in line 5, and substitute the following:

"The Secretary of Labor, by arrangement with the Secretary of the Treasury, shall assign a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service, not lower in rank than assistant surgeon, trained in psychiatry, who shall be received and carried on each vessel transporting immigrant passengers."

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the past three days of rather acrimonious debate, it appears to me that there has been one undercurrent of unanimity, for it seemed to be the desire on the part of every Member in this body that if there should be an alien afflicted either mentally or physically, means should be provided to keep him out of the country. It is with that in view that I have offered this amendment, that there shall be assigned on every steamship a surgeon of the Public Health Service, trained in the psychiatry, and at the risk of wearying you a little I will repeat what I have said before: Since 1910, when the Immigration Commission reported to Congress, it has been proven that a great proportion of the evils in our society are the result of inherited mental defects, and that these evils are transmitted according to the lines of the Mendelian law. To correct that, I offer this amendment.

I have no means of knowing from what angle the committee will oppose this amendment. If they oppose it upon the ground of expense, I wish to suggest to the members of the committee that since 1909 the head tax has been made a revenue measure, and over $1,000,000 a year has been covered into the Federal Treasury, which had far better been applied to the proper inspection of arriving immigrants. If they oppose it on the ground of impracticability that the amendment is too broad, I should be very glad to hear suggestions from the committee making it perhaps a little bit more reasonable. If they oppose the amendment on the ground of the legal aspects of it, I simply claim that when the Supreme Court of the United States held that the establishment of a head tax was a just and reasonable regula-tion under our maritime laws that there is no legal objection to our assigning these surgeons to the steamships; and if they object to it on the ground that the foreign ships do not want these surgeons on board, then, I say, let the foreign steamship companies take their vessels to some other country.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in opposition to the amendment. Has the gentleman made any inquiries as to whether there are any surgeons of the Public Health Service of the rank of passed assistant surgeon who, as a matter of fact, are trained in psychiatry?

Mr. BROWN of New York. The gentleman will notice that the amendment I sent to the desk is a little different from the amendment as printed in the RECORD. I have made investigation, and for that reason I changed the amendment so it would include the grade of assistant surgeon instead of passed assistant surgeon.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, this science of psychiatry is a sort of glorified insanity specialism. There is a good deal of exaggeration going the rounds about this whole business. As a matter of fact, this science of psychiatry is new to the surgeons of the United States Public Health Service. I humbly admit that I never heard of it until I read of it in the Record of January 30, 1914. The gentleman from New York publishes a splendid bibliography of this science.

I observe that the following light literature on the subject is available:

These are a few of the simpler works on the subject. The RECORD of January 30 contains three and a half columns of familiar household references like these.

Mr. KINDEL. What page is that?

Mr. GARDNER. Page 2620 of the Congressional Record. Unless the gentleman has referred this amendment to the Government authorities and has an official report on it, I do not believe that this House ought to consider it at this time. It was not brought before the Immigration Committee.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. With pleasure.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will state that just because the gentleman from Massachusetts never heard of this great science of psychiatry is no reason why the House should not be willing to consider it. I will further state for the gentleman's information that I talked with Surg. Gen. Blue, and he stated to me that he is very fortunate nowadays in that he has been able to get assistant surgeons in his service who have been trained in psychiatry in the great institutions of the State of New York and, I dare say, of the State of Massachusetts also.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question if his time has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Did I understand the Chair to say his time had expired? I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given a minute or two in order to answer a question-a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be given minute in order to answer a question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York this question. This amendment would correct the evils and abuses of which the State of New York continuously complains?

Mr. BROWN of New York. I believe it is a most effective improvement and-

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I mean in regard to filling the insane asylums.

Mr. BROWN of New York. We pay every year in taxes in the State of New York almost three and a half million dollars—the chairman of the committee was very kind enough to say nearly four million dollars in his report—for the care of the allen insane, many of whom would be excluded by the adoption of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. If I am permitted, I want to say, in answer to the gentleman's remarks, that a large part of the report of the committee is taken up with the question of insane aliens and the number in the asylums in the State of New York, and that is the reason that is urged for the passage of this bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the section and on the amendment thereto be now closed.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a further amendment?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brown]. My amendment is to strike out the clause in the amendment-I do not know where it is-" not lower in rank than an assistant surgeon."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brown] provides that the rank of surgeon shall be that of assistant surgeon.

Mr. TOWNER. I did not quite understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the words stricken out be read.

Mr. TOWNER. We can understand it better if it is all read. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, line 1, strike out all after the word "landing" to the word "passengers," in line 5, and substitute the following:

"The Secretary of Labor, by an arrangement with the Secertary of the Treasury, shall assign a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service, not lower in rank than assistant surgeon, trained in psychiatry, who shall be beceived and carried on each vessel transporting immigrant passengers."

Mr. TOWNER. My amendment is to strike out the words from the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. namely. "not lower in rank than assistant surgeon."

Mr. GARDNER. I ask unanimous consent to oppose this

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] asks unanimous consent to proceed, for how long?

Mr. TOWNER. Two minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. For how long?

Mr. TOWNER. Five minutes.
Mr. BURNETT. I object to that length of time, I am willing that each gentleman shall have two minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I wish to suggest—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-NETT] objected to the request.

Mr. BURNETT, I will not object to three minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brown] that it is not necessary for those words to be in there for his purpose. If they are learned in psychiatry, they are qualified to pass upon the question that the gentleman desires. And in that connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say this, if it is not now understood, that this is an important matter. If it is not now understood that the gentleman is proposing really a serious and a perfectly legitimate and proper test for immigrants to come to this country, gentlemen in the future will understand. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], I should think, with his learning and knowledge and his admiration for those things, should be the last one to throw any opprobrium or contempt upon this special branch of learning that is now receiving the respect of men all over the world who have considered this question. And certainly this question which is submitted and this proposition that has been urged upon the committee by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brown] is one well worthy of the most serious consideration of the House. [Applause.]
Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I ought not to have taken the amendment in the vein in which I did. Here are the facts: This section we are considering now is the section against which various foreign nations are protesting, because, as they say, we propose to give a surgeon of the United States plenary power over the health of passengers, for whom the captains of foreign vessels are responsible. We realize that our plan is an innovation and a very great innovation, although Italy has adopted something similar. Last year, in spite of the protests from foreign Governments, we incorporated this provision in the bill, but we took care to insert the requirement that the surgeons who represent the United States and who must enter into geons who represent the United States and who must enter into such difficult relations with captains of foreign steamships should be surgeons of high rank and ripe experience.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Please excuse me, for I have only two minutes. We provided that no medical officer lower in rank than a passed assistant surgeon should be detailed for this service. Now you say, "Never mind the rank. Detail some young assistant." I hope that the House will not be carried away by an exaggerated view of this whole subject.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substi-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rogers] offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.
Mr. ROGERS. And I should like to have three minutes in which to discuss that.

Mr. BURNETT. I object, Mr. Chairman. I made the objection awhile ago.

Mr. ROGERS. It is an important paragraph, and there has been practically no discussion of it up to the present time.

Mr. SABATH. I hope the gentleman from Alabama BURNETT] will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rogers]. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 1, after the period, insert a new sentence, as follows: 'It shall further be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to report n writing to the Secretary of Labor any respects in which the vessel to which they have been assigned may fail to cater to the reasonable comfort and well-being of its immigrant passengers. Upon such information, even though the failure reported may not be violative of law, the Secretary of Labor may direct such changes in such vessels as he may deem desirable. The Secretary of Labor may require any vessel to equip that part of its deck space assigned to immigrant passengers with seating accommodations for the free use of such passengers as he may deem to be desirable, and not to interfere unduly with other proper uses of such deck space."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes for the discussion of that substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rogers] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is twofold. The earlier part of section 11 already contains a most admirable provision that inspectors and matrons shall be carried on these immigrant-bearing vessels; it provides further that these inspectors and matrons shall, during provides further that these inspectors and matrons shall, during the voyage, observe the immigrants and report concerning their admissibility when they get to a port of the United States, and also that they shall observe and report any violations of the "passenger act."

The amendment which I am offering seeks to make these officials still more useful, so that they may also be enabled to examine into the general conditions prevailing upon the vessel to which they are assigned, and to make suggestions for the comfort and well-being of all immigrants who may thereafter travel on such vessel. It is not always necessary that a thing should be violative of law in order to be objectionable, and I am trying to make these officials useful in a wider sphere than the law now contemplates by allowing them to make suggestions as to what modification of existing conditions or what change of equipment will tend to the added comfort and well-being, physical and moral, of future immigrants coming to this coun-

Furthermore, and in the second place, I am advised by one of the most eminent penologists of Massachusetts that there is a good deal of immorality resulting from the overcrowded and underequipped condition of the decks of immigrant vessels. The immigrants of both sexes are herded together on deck in every sort of weather, forced either to stand or to lie down on the deck, with no place whatever where they may sit and rest. My amendment provides that deck seating accommodations may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be required of any vessel, so that these people may have that measure of comfort and of decency in connection with their ocean voyage.

It seems to me that in both these respects the amendment is a meritorious one, and I ask that the committee consider not in a meritorious one, and I ask that the committee consider not in a cursory way, but carefully, whether there is not real worth in the proposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]. The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ROGERS. I demand a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 41. Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Towner]. The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brown].

The amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC, 12. To each alien or head of a family shall be given a ticket on which shall be written his name, a number or letter designating the list in which his name, etc., are contained, and his number on said list, for convenience of identification on arrival. Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer, or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and oral examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act, and that also, according to the best of his knowledge and bellef, the information in said lists or manifests oncerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect. That the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith shall also sign each of said aliens named therein and make oath or affirmation in like manner before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, stating his professional experience and qualifications as a physician and surgeon, and that he has made a personal examination of each of the said aliens named therein, and that the said list or manifest, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, is full, correct, and true in all particulars relative to the mental and physical condition of said aliens. an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "a United States consular officer" and insert the words "the officer duly empowered to administer an oath."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, it is evident the United States consular officer would not be the person to administer the oath required in this paragraph, presuming the port of arrival to be in the United States, because there are no consular officers at United States ports.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman is mistaken. gentleman will read the whole section, I think he will find that that manifest has to be made out before the vessel sails.

Mr. MOORE. It subsequently refers to the port of arrival. I think if the gentleman reads it carefully he will find that these manifests are to be sworn to and the oath is to be taken at the port of arrival. There is where the inspection takes place.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman will observe that this section deals with inward manifests. These manifests are made out on shipboard and are handed to our immigration authorities immediately on arrival in order to forward at once the work of examining the immigrants. They must be sworn to by the cap-tain and the surgeon of the ship. They simply constitute prima facie evidence to our authorities as to the facts about the immigrants. But in many cases no surgeon sails on the vessel. Perhaps it is a small vessel from the Cape Verde Islands, for instance. Nevertheless, a statement of the facts must be ready on arriving or there will be intolerable congestion and delay. In cases of this sort we provide that the ship must employ a competent surgeon to examine the immigrants before they sail. We also provide that the results of these examinations must be sworn to by the surgeons who make them.

Clearly those affidavits must be made in foreign countries. That is why we provide that they shall be made before United States consular officers.

Mr. MOORE. Now, beginning with line 9, the bill says:

Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer, or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. My amendment proposes to strike out "the United States consular officer" and substitute "one qualified to administer oaths," who must be an immigration officer or one

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman does not understand. The captain must collect certain facts for his manifests. This section tells how he shall collect them. He must gather his medical facts from the surgeon who sails with him. We provide that both the captain and the ship's surgeon must take their oaths before an immigration officer at the port of arrival. We provide for those affidavits in line 13 and line 25 of page 26. But, if there is no ship's doctor, then the medical examinations must be made before sailing, and we provide, in line 11, page 27, that they must be verified under oath before a United States consular officer.

Mr. MOORE. I fear the gentleman will confuse his purpose by letting that stand. Now, in line 22, page 26, it says:

That the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith shall also sign each of said lists or manifests and make oath or affirmation in like manner before an immigration officer at the port of arrival.

Mr. GARDNER. Of course, because the vessel's surgeon is right on the spot and has his material all ready to present. The manifests are prepared on board the vessel, in order to facilitate the examination and admission of the aliens when they arrive. This section provides that if the preliminary medical examination is made by the ship's surgeon it shall be sworn to on arrival. If, however, it is made by a hired surgeon on shore, it must be sworn to before the vessel sails for chusetts has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more, in order that the gentleman may complete his statement. I would like to ask him another question. This seems to be an important matter in connection with the efficiency of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman's interpretation of the last sentence of the paragraph, line 24, is correct that this examination is to be made at a foreign port, it brings up the general question of the governmental right to make an examination

Mr. GARDNER. This foreign examination is provided for by the existing law. All we are doing here is to provide for its verification before a consul of the United States. All the medical facts about the immigrants must be ready on arrival. How are they to be arrived at? There are two ways. If a surgeon is aboard the vessel, they are arrived at aboard the vessel and are certified to by the ship's doctor on his arrival in the port of New York. If there is no ship's doctor aboard, then a surgeon must be hired to make the examination in a foreign port.

Mr. MOORE. That is the very thing which has given rise to objections heretofore. The gentleman presupposes examination in foreign ports.

Mr. GARDNER. We have a great many examinations at foreign ports not only by surgeons hired by vessel owners but also by officers of the United States. Every big steamship company, I am told, has examinations made in a foreign port as a matter of self-protection.

Mr. MOORE. How can the surgeon employed by a steamship company certify to a manifest after the vessel has sailed?

Mr. GARDNER. He does not swear to the manifest after the vessel has sailed. He swears to it before the vessel sails. Mr. MOORE. Then the steamship company is permitted to make the examination before the steamer leaves the foreign port.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who have had especial training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defect shall be detailed for duty or employed at all large ports of entry, and such medical officers shall be provided with suitable facilities for the detention and examination of all arriving aliens in whom insanity or mental defect is suspected, and the services of interpreters shall be provided for such examination. Immigrant inspectors are hereby authorized and empowered to board and search for aliens any vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle in which they believe aliens are being brought into the United States. Said inspectors shall have power to administer oaths and to take and consider evidence touching the right of any allen to enter, reenter, pass through, or reside in the United States, and, where such action may be necessary, to make a written record of such evidence; and any person to whom such an oath has been administered, under the provisions of this act, who shall knowlingly or willfully give false evidence or swear to any false statement in any way affecting or in relation to the right of any allen to admission, or readmission to, or to pass through, or to reside in the United States shall be deemed guilty of perjury and be punished as provided by section 125 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," Any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge shall also have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses before said inspectors and the production of books, papers, and documents touching the right of any allen to enter, reside in, or pass through the United States, and any district court within the jurisdiction of which investigations are being conducted by an immigrant inspector may, in the event of neglect or refusal to respond to a subpoxal ssued by any commissioner of immigr

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking what provision there is in this proposed law to do away with the filling of insane asylums in the State of New York primarily with alien insane, and if in the opinion of the committee a cursory examination at the point of entry will correct that evil and abuse?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, we have made the best effort that we know how to make. We propose to exclude imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have had an attack of insanity at any time previously. Hitherto we have admitted any alien who has had a single attack of insanity unless it had occurred within five years. Moreover, we have provided for surgeons and matrons on shipboard, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, an entirely new provision of law. We have also made the captain of immigrant vessels responsible for the accurate determination as to whether or not any of his passengers are insane, and we penalize steamship companies for bringing over here persons whose insanity could be ascertained beforehand.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Are not the provisions to which the

Mr. O'SHAUNESSI. Are not the provisions to which the gentleman has just referred directory and not mandatory?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, no, indeed. There is only one that is permissive, and that is the provision which permits the Secretary of Labor to use his judgment as to placing surgeons and matrons aboard ship.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Let me ask this question: Is it not a fact now that the present method of examination is a cursory examination, and does the gentleman believe that any medical officer is qualified to take a great line of immigrants and to say upon a superficial examination that this man or that man is insane?

Mr. GARDNER. I do say that the examination is excellent that is made of those coming into Ellis Island to-day.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Why, then, are the insane asylums of New York filled with alien insane?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, they would be full of insane, no matter how much inspection you provide.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman, in conclusion, that I consider the condition of the insane asylums in the State of New York as an indictment of the immigration law and of the immigration officials.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Island has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That boards of special inquiry shall be appointed by the commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge at the various ports of arrival as may be necessary for the prompt determination of all cases of immigrants detained at such ports under the provisions of the law. Each board shall consist of three members, who shall be selected from such of the immigrant officials in the service as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall from time to time designate as qualified to serve on such boards. When in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor the maintenance of a permanent board of special inquiry for service at any sea or land border port is not warranted, regularly constituted boards may be detailed from other stations for temporary service at such port, or, if that be impracticable, the Secretary of Labor shall authorize the creation of boards of special inquiry by the immigration officials in charge at such ports, and shall determine what Government officials or other persons shall be eligible for service on such boards. Such boards shall have authority to determine whether an allen who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported. All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public. Such boards shall keep a complete permanent record of their proceedings and of all such testimony as may be produced before them; and the decision of any two members of a board shall prevail, but either the allen or any dissenting member of the said board may appeal through the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival and the taking of such appeal shall operate to stay any action in regard to the final disposal of any allen whose case is so appealed until the receipt by the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival and function of the taking of such allension of a board of special inquiry. Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, strike out all of line 4, and the words "from the public" in line 5.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment is adopted, it will strike out that provision in the bill which provides that all hearings before such boards of special inquiry shall be separate and apart from the public. For years and years we have heard complaints about the way these examinations are conducted at Ellis Island, and I am of the opinion that we should immediately abolish this practice, which is a relic of medieval times and which was discontinued years ago by even the most barbarous Governments, for surely no country that professes to be civilized should tolerate such inquisitorial methods.

At present no one is allowed to appear in behalf of the alien before these boards of special inquiry, which are conducting these hearings in seclusion and in rooms to which no one has admission, and this I believe is most unjust.

I do not think it is the intention of this House to sanction inquisition, and this is exactly what these present hearings before these boards amount to. I do not believe that we should permit the hearing of these cases without giving the public, or at least those who are interested in the case, the right and privilege of being present and seeing what is transpiring. I am of the opinion that the service would be greatly benefited and that the members of these boards of special inquiry would be more humane and would give more consideration to the statements made by these unfortunate immigrants if these star-chamber proceedings were abolished.

Under the present practice an unfortunate immigrant, one who possibly has spent nearly his last dollar to reach our hospitable shores, may be marked by some inspector as "likely to become a public charge," and he is then sent to a board of special inquiry. At the hearing before this board the immigrant is not permitted to have anyone with him; there is no one to aid him; and frequently he does not fully understand one-half of the questions put to him. Unless the immigrant can answer all these questions to the entire satisfaction of this czarlike board, then he is ordered deported. Now, I ask you, gentlemen, is this fair, is this just, is it humane? I say that in all these cases where we do not give them the right or privilege of being represented by a friend or attorney we should at least see to that these hearings are conducted in public, so that the people interested may know the conditions under which they are being held and tried. I believe that the chairman of this committee, if he were thoroughly acquainted with the way these hearings are being conducted, would gladly accede to this amendment, and I hope that all of you gentlemen who wish to see justice done and every man given a fair trial will vote for this important amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized for five minutes. I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will effectuate the purpose intended by an amendment which I was about to offer. I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] on raising his voice in this Chamber in behalf of the oppressed. Not satisfied with dealing a blow to liberty and assailing free institutions by means of the literacy test which is now passed in this House, so far as this bill is concerned, I trust gentlemen in this Chamber will pay the attention that the question deserves to these starchamber proceedings that obtain at Ellis Island and at other ports of entry. Think of it, my American friends here, you who want to close the door so as to make it more difficult for these people to enter the United States, was there ever a time in the history of a man's life when he deserves sympathy and kindness and decency and justice as when he is fatigued, tired both mentally and bodily, after crossing the ocean under circumstances that you and I perhaps would not wish to endure, when he is haled before a board representing the land of the free and the home of the brave and grilled and cross-examined to death in private? Who here in this Chamber can justify such a proceeding; who here in this Chamber will say that it is the American way of doing things? Who in this Chamber will say that it is a decent way, a fair way, to treat an immigrant? He is afraid; he is nervous; he is on the threshold of a new land, seeking liberty, and he is met by a club in the hands of the officials of this Government. I am proud of an opportunity to denounce this practice, and I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will prevail.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, this has been existing law for many years, and two years ago we heard the same kind of charges made against the commissioner of immigration at Ellis Island, and Mr. Sulzer, the man who was governor of New York up to some weeks ago, introduced a resolution in this House by which he asked an investigation of the conduct of Commissioner Williams, who was in charge at Ellis Island. lution was referred to the Committee on Rules. All these great stories that gentlemen have talked about to-day were investigated by them and rehashed, and when the commissioner and the inspectors who had made the examinations presented their side of the case the resolution actually broke down, and the man who introduced it himself admitted that the commissioner there had not done wrong.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman permit? Mr. BURNETT. I will. Mr. SABATH. That investigation was not to investigate the conduct of the special trial board. That investigation was as to the conditions at Ellis Island. The question we are raising was in regard to the trial board and their secret proceedings.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the charges that were made were that the trials which were conducted by and under the control of the commissioner of immigration were fraudulent and unfair, just as the gentleman has to-day asserted they were, and an investigation of the hearings will show it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my judgment is that this is in the interests of the immigrant himself to a very great extent. have that immigrant subjected to a public examination, where the public is there all the time, and, in my opinion, he will be more embarrassed, more subjected to what might appear to break him down, and worry him, than if the examination be conducted privately. Then again, Mr. Chairman, it would simply be a matter of impossibility to get through with these investigations, a million a year—900,000 of them came to Ellis Island last year—and hundreds and hundreds of cases are all along being investigated by these boards of inquiry; and for that reason it would be simply interminable and impossible to get through with them if they had to be conducted in public in that kind of a way, because of the interruptions that would be made, because of the remarks that would be interlarded, and things of that kind. And it seems to me it is in the interest of not only of the immigrant, but in the interest of expediting the service that the examinations should be conducted as they have been for years and years.

Now, if an injustice is done, that immigrant has the right of appeal to the Secretary of Labor and has the right to be represented by counsel on that appeal. We believe we have guarded him sufficiently all the way through, and I hope this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly. I wish to offer a few observations on this amendment, and I do so with a great deal of confidence that the amendment will be adopted. It is inconceivable to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Members of Congress here present this afternoon can hesitate in agreeing to this amendment. It is manifestly unfair to conduct a star-chamber examination of a man seeking admission to our shores. It is unfair under the old law and infinitely more unfair under the literacy test of the new law. If immigrants are to be excluded because they can not read, and they are examined in secret, it places an autocratic power in the hands of the immigrant official who passes upon the applicant to reject every unfortunate exile who may happen to be of limited education, and such an examination by a hostile examiner behind closed doors will, of course, result in judgment against the applicant, final judgment beyond the right or power of appeal in most cases, because the immigrant will not know how to appeal. He does not know to whom he can appeal. He is not familiar with the law.

Mr. GARDNER. The padrone does. I ask the gentleman if, as a matter of fact, they are not informed of their power to appeal?

Mr. MANAHAN. Why, no. Who informs them? Suppose that to-morrow there come from Hungary 500 immigrants who can not read, and they are landed in the old shack at Ellis Island; who has told any one of them that if the man who passes upon his right to enter here shall deny him that right, he has the lawful alternative of appeal and can hire lawyers, and so forth?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MANAHAN. No; I have not the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to answer your question.

Mr. MANAHAN. You can answer it after I have concluded. I say that the immigrant does not know his rights. He is helpless in a strange land, confronted by hostile strangers, compelled to undergo an examination in the absence of friends or of fellow countrymen, and without a chance for refutation if falsely accused of being barred by law. It is a star-chamber procedure.

Now, I read an article over the signature of the Assistant Secretary of Labor, a good Democrat, Mr. Louis F. Post, an editorial published in his own paper, where he says:

The examination is as simple as it is autocratic.

It is autocratic. Is that Democratic, I will ask my friends on the other side of the House? And it is not only autocratic in the mind of Mr. Post but-

The examination is summary and crude.

It is summary, crude, and autocratic, and now you have it behind closed doors, and then boast of our liberty under the Stars and Stripes and of our fairness to all mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANAHAN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend as a part of my remarks the editorial signed by Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor, upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the editorial referred to:

OUR IMMIGRANT EXCLUSION LAWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 21.

Washington, D. C., September 21.

"The inspiring struggle of an immigrant boy who became the greatest editor of his time." This announcement of S. S. McClure's autobiography, which begins in the October McClure's, caught my eye at a newsstand yesterday. I was interested, for I have known somewhat of S. S. McClure's editorial career since long before he started McClure's Magazine, back in those days of smaller things, in the early eighties, when he was pioneering in newspaper "syndicates," and I knew that his career, told as he can tell it, would make good reading.

There was nothing disappointing in the first installment. Beginning with his birth in Ireland 56 years ago and ending with his arrival in the United States at the age of 0 as a steerage immigrant, along with his mother and her three other children, all younger than himself, it, of course, does not touch upon the wide range of fascinating recollections of American life which may be expected of future installments. But it is fascinating simply as the story of an industrious and mildly prosperous peasant family in Ireland half a century ago, impoverished by the death of its breadwinner. What interests me most, however, in this installment of Mr. McClure's autobiography is the contrast it suggests to me of immigration when he was a boy and immigration now.

When he came here there were no immigrant officials to stop his widowed mother and her four little children at the national boundary line, no imprisonment at Eliis Island, no star-chamber investigations by immigrant boards of inquiry, no decisions directing their deportation. Landing at Quebec, the family went direct to Valparaiso, Ind., where they were met by one of the mother's brothers, and were taken to an Indiana farm where one of her married sisters lived. Those were the days when we welcomed the impoverished and oppressed of all nations, for, as we were then proud to sing, "Uncle Sam is rich enough to give us all a farm."

True, even in those days, there were native Americans who objected to th that they have placed upon the Federal statute books a congeries of allen-exclusion laws which challenge the civilized world for drastic character and autocratic powers of execution. The monopolization by a few of our vast areas of what only half a century ago was common land is the principal—perhaps it is the sole—effective reason for these exclusion laws. When your lands are monopolized, work gets scarce; when work is scarce, competition for jobs grows keener; when competition for jobs is keen, immigration makes it keener still; and when immigration does this, immigration reclusion laws seem necessary. On the surface our exclusion laws are not all inspired by pressure upon opportunities for work. There are sanitary reasons and moral reasons and race reasons. But all necessity for restrictions for those reasons would probably disappear if the demand for workers constantly exceeded the supply.

probably disappear if the demand for workers constantly exceeded the supply.

As it is, however—unlike the time when S. S. McClure's widowed and impoverished mother brought her three young children to this country from Ireland—our immigrant-exclusion laws prohibit the admission of a great variety of aliens. Originally these restrictions applied only to "Immigrants," Therefore an alien who had acquired a permanent residence in this country could go back and forth at will, as freely as a citizen, even though he were not naturalized, and with no risk whatever of being stopped upon his return. But by substituting "alien" for "immigrant," in an amendment, Congress has authorized the stopping of any alien. He can be stopped though he has lived all his adult life in this country, though all his business and family interests are here, and though he has neither family nor business connections anywhere else, provided he is, upon his return from any foreign trip, adjudged by the immigrant inspectors at the port of his return to be within any of the excluded classes. —

The excluded classes comprise all aliens who are insane, feeble-minded.

The excluded classes comprise all aliens who are insane, feeble-minded, or afflicted with tuberculosis or a loathsome contagious disease; who have any mental or physical defect that may interfere with their making a living; who come under labor contract; who are anarchists (whether of the peaceable or Quaker type or of the violent type who justify destructive methods in respect of life or property, as being a species of warfare); who have been convicted or admit the commission of any crime, however trivial, and whether it is political or not, if it be a crime involving moral turpitude; or who are for any reason likely to become public charges, either in prisons as convicts or in charitable institutions as paupers.

Most of them, perhaps 90 or 95 per cent, are special board and of the rest are held for special examination by a examination is summary and crude, but as a rule as fair as that kind of trial (apart from the public and without right of professional representation) can be. The verdict of this board is final in all cases, unless it is adverse to the allen and the allen appeals. It is final in most other cases, subject to a limited power vested in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor of a kind akin to the pardoning power of a governor. examination would have revealed at least one reason for detention in this case, namely, "I. c. p." (likely to become a public charge), owing to her scant supply of money, to the number and tender years of her children, and to the fact that her nearest relatives in this country were only brothers and sisters, and maybe not very well off, either. In due time—there is really no undue delay—the whole group would have found themselves in police-court-like quarters, and on trial by a board of three immigrant inspectors. The trial wouldn't have taken long, but the board would have waited until Mrs. McClure could get affidavits from her brothers and sisters in Indiana. They would then have decided her case, and their decision would almost certainly have been that she and her children were likely to become public charges, whereupon all would have been ordered to be deported to Ireland, the country whence they came. She would, however, have been advised of her right to appeal, which right she would doubtless have exercised. Then the commissioner would have examined this young widow with her four infant children, and probably have concluded that although she made a good appearance the board's decision was right. The record would have made his recommendations and turned them over with the record to the Secretary or the Acting Secretary for final decision.

The latter official would first have tried to grasp the case with economy of mental effort by reading the recommendations, which would have advised him somewhat to this effect: "Elizabeth McClure (widow) and several brothers, as well as her late husband's father, in Ireland; claims two unmarried brothers and two married sisters in Indiana; tickets to Valparaiso, but very little money; her own mother (widow) and several brothers as well as her late husband's father, in Ireland; alleged brothers and sisters in Indiana have filed affidavity on their part to do so if the aliens are not self-supporting. Alleged brothers and sisters offer bonds, but as the elder alien's mother

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, the few contract laborers whom we catch now will escape in the I wish I could picture to you the manner in which the examination of arriving immigrants is carried on. They come up in long lines to the inspectors, after they have passed the surgeons. Groups of the same nationality stream along. Often it is thought that padrones are scattered throughout the groups.

This first examination is entirely public. It is seldom that ou would find anyone in such groups as these who was not thoroughly coached on all the answers which he ought to make to the questions of the inspector. Every good coach knows very well the questions which are going to be asked.

Somewhere in the line you can often see a man stretching his head up to hear what questions are being asked, to find out what is going on. That is the first examination. That examination is made in public. Everyone can hear what is being said, and the padrone can tip the wink if incorrect answers are being What is the next procedure? If one of the inspectors thinks that some of the answers given are suspicious, the immigrant goes before a board of special inquiry, consisting of three men, who, I submit, are as likely to be humane as are the Mem-bers of this House. It is true that those three men under the law must conduct that second examination in private. They take the immigrant apart, where his padrone can not be on hand, where no one in the crowd can signal the answer to some awkward question.

That is the reason for the private inquiry. It is prescribed in order that on the second examination the immigrant shall be segregated from the people who have been coaching him to evade our laws.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GARDNER. After I am through I will yield.
Then what happens, Mr. Chairman? Remember that these three men constituting the board of special inquiry are picked from amongst the best men in the force by the Secretary of Labor. If any one of these three men is dissatisfied as to the result of the examination, even if the two other members of the board overrule him, he can take an appeal to the Secretary of Not only can a single inspector take an appeal, but the alien himself can take an appeal. When the case goes up to the Secretary, the alien is permitted to have his counsel or any one else whom he chooses to represent him.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BURNETT. I move that all debate on this section and

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the committee has just voted down a proposition to permit the immigrant to be heard in the open. You have voted to lock him up behind closed doors and administer to him a grilling and a cross-examination, which, in my opinion, is absolutely at variance with decency and justice and even common politeness. I am very sorry to see the temper of this House expressed in favor of conduct which can not be justified according to the standards to which I give my devotion.

The amendment that I have just offered does not provide that the hearing shall be public, but it simply provides that the poor immigrant, if he desires it, may be represented by counsel; and I again appeal to the gentlemen in this Chamber and ask them if that is not a fair provision. Is it asking too much for a man who comes a stranger to a strange land to allow him to be represented by counsel, paid for out of his own pocket or out of the pockets of his friends? I think a body of Members who vote down such a proposition as that indict their own sense of decency and their own sense of justice, not to say their humanitarianism.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed an article from the New York World of November 30, 1913, dealing with the abuses at Ellis

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object think the gentleman ought not to print that article, because it is full of so many horrible misstatements that everybody knows are misstatements. Still I shall not object. The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE GREAT AMERICAN HOLD-UP AT ELLIS ISLAND—A SPOT IN NEW YORK BAY WHERE THE CONSTITUTION IS NOT IN FORCE.

"The portals of the temple we have raised to freedom shall then be thrown wide, as an asylum to mankind. America shall receive to her bosom and comfort and cheer the oppressed, the miserable, and the poor of every nation and of every clime. THE HEAD TAX.

When Gouverneur Morris penned the closing lines of the famous report which declared that the recognition of American independence must precede any negotiations for peace with Great Britain, he little dreamed that the day would come when the United States would levy a head tax upon every alien coming here and maintain a costly and important department of the Government to prevent the oppressed, the miserable, and the poor of other countries from entering this promised land.

And yet it is so. Every alien who enters this country, except those passing through in transit, pays $4 for the privilege, and it matters not how long he stays or how often he comes back, the head tax is exacted over and over again every time he lands here. This money, together with all fines and rentals collected under the immigration laws, is paid into the Treasury of the United States to defray the cost of regulating the immigration of allens.

But if all the money received from immigrants is paid into the Treasury, nothing is paid out again, except as Congress is pleased to appropriate to defray the cost of the service. So there has accumulated a fund of millions of dollars—about eight millions—which is unexpended despite the fact that the quarters provided for the detention of immigrants are scandalously inadequate or altogether lacking, and that a larger number of inspectors and an increased medical staff are imperatively needed. tively needed.

THE ELLIS ISLAND GATEWAY.

In the last 10 years for which statistics are available—from 1903 to 1912—nine million three hundred and seventy-five thousand-odd immigrants have been admitted to the United States, and of this number more than 8,000,000 have arrived at the port of New York. That is why Ellis Island is the best place to study the immigration question, and to see just how the law is applied and in what manner it works. By permission of the authorities, I have had the access to every part of Ellis Island day and night for the past two weeks. Every question I have asked has been fully and frankly answered. I have talked freely with the immigrants, and I have been afforded the most ample opportunity to see everything, good and bad. To both the acting commissioner, Mr. Byron Uhl, and the superintendent, Mr. P. A. Baker, I am indebted for much generous assistance. They have done everything in their power to facilitate my inquiry in every way.

PERSONS TO BE EXCLUDED.

Section 2 of the immigration act provides that the following classes

Persons to be excluded.

Section 2 of the immigration act provides that the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission to the United States:

FIRST, MEDICAL EXAMINATION.

Thus every immigrant has to pass a medical examination and satisfy the immigration officials besides that he is "clearly and beyond a doubt" entitled to land. From the very first moment that an alien presents himself for admission the whole burden of proof is thrown upon him. The attitude of the department is that admission to the United States is a privilege, and that the person seeking admission must prove that he or she is entitled to it.

Every morning at 7 o'clock a revenue cutter leaves the Battery with a number of inspectors and doctors aboard. They proceed to quarantine, and as soon as a vessel has been granted pratique by the health officer of the port the Federal authorities board her. In most ports the doctors of the Federal Public Health Service conduct the medical examination of the immigrants and also do the quarantine work, but in New York Harbor every vessel is first visited by the port doctor, who a State official, and then by the Federal doctors, who examine the

HELD UP BY SPITE,

Cabin passengers are taken first. One by one they pass in front of the doctor, who makes a rapid inspection, examining more closely those he may suspect of having any physical or mental disability that may come under the terms of the act. The passengers then pass before an inspector, who satisfies himself as to their identity and checks up the information which the law obliges the owners of vessels to furnish on a manifest showing the name, age, sex, nationality, residence in the United States, occupation, time of last arrival, amount of money carried, and destination of every alien. As a rule first and second cabin passengers are less liable to be ineligible than steerage passengers and the work proceeds apace. Each inspector, however, has beside him and compares with the manifest a little black book, in which are entered the names of hundreds of individuals against whose coming the immigration authorities have been warned. Some of these notices are bona fide, some are lodged through spite. Any such person is held for special inquiry, and if an alien has been denounced—even by a mere letter unsupported by proof of any kind—he is almost certain to have to spend a few days on Ellis Island.

TEMPORARILY DETAINED.

The second-cabin passengers are examined more closely than the first. They are almost invariably people who have to work for a living, and any noticeable physical or mental shortcoming results in their being held and sent to the island for further medical examination. The immigration inspectors also are much stricter in the second cabin than they are in the first. The little black books are again in evidence. Each immigrant is required to actually show the amount of money in his or her possession. Quite a number of those who arrive for the first time are denied the right to land freely. They are either temporarily detained, to be called for by relatives or friends, or, if they have railroad transportation to other cities, are turned over to representatives of the Travelers' Aid Society or other similar organizations.

ARBITRARY PATERNALISM.

There can be no doubt that a number of the neonle, especially women.

There can be no doubt that a number of the people, especially women, thus held on board the vessel are clearly entitled to land, and there is no legal warrant for their detention. It is arbitrary paternalism. Of course, the plea is made that these steps are taken in the interest and for the protection of the immigrant. This is very often true; indeed, I was impressed with the real solicitude for the immigrants' welfare manifested by the inspectors, but the fact remains that they detain many people who have a legal right to land.

When the work of examining the first and second class passengers is concluded, which by hard work is generally before the vessel reaches her dock, the boarding inspectors see to it that all those held for special inquiry or further medical examination are sent to Ellis Island along with the steerage aliens. The steamship company is responsible for their safe delivery, and they are put on board barges and taken to the immigration station in charge of one of the boarding inspectors, who brings with him the manifest.

ONE DAY'S ARRIVALS.

who brings with him the manitest.

ONE DAY'S ARRIVALS.

It is here at Ellis Island that one gets a clear insight into the class of immigrants that are coming into the United States; barge load after barge load of living freight is landed, and as the almost continuous stream of men, women, and children passes through the entrance that leads to the medical division one can see with one's own eyes what kind of people are seeking admission. In one day I saw 4,990 of them. They were not the scum of Europe—very far from it. They were mostly of a surprisingly high peasant type and came of stock which for generations has earned its bread by the sweat of its brow; people from the outlying rural districts of Europe, tillers of the soil who in times of peace have fed their more fortunate fellow men and who in times of war have furnished the Kings and Emperors of Europe with the backbone of their armies. That was my general impression.

Among them, of course, there was a sprinkling of "the miserable and the poor of every nation and of every clime," but if this country wants immigrants at all it will have great difficulty in getting a better class than I have lived among for the past fortnight. One most striking proof is this: Venereal disease is almost unknown among them. Taking all the immigrants, good and bad, the general average of those afficied is less than 2 per cent. In New York City it is probably as high as 20 per cent, and the allen falls a ready prey to it when his fresh, untainted blood is exposed to corruption in our midst, to such an extent that at least one European Government is studying the means it can take to prevent the healthy immigrants it sends to America coming back and contaminating its rural districts with diseases of the cities which have never yet penetrated there.

LIVE HUMAN FREIGHT.

One thing, however, struck me unfavorably. Unless the alien has been here before, or has relatives and friends in this country, his coming is very seldom spontaneous. It does not spring from his own desire or volition; it is the result of external suggestion or incitement. Hundreds come here who had never heard of the new world, who did not even know there was such a place as America, until their villages were visited by the agent of some steamship company who allured them by grossly exaggerated and lying statements to sell all their worldly goods and turn over the proceeds to him. In this manner whole ham ets almost have been uprooted to furnish the steamship company with the kind of freight that pays best—live human freight. These people are allured by promises of material prosperity; they do not realize what this country stands for or that it is "a temple raised to freedom." Indeed, there is nothing about Ellis Island that could suggest such a thing.

IN SINGLE FILE.

On entering the main building the immigrants pass in single file between two sets of railings. Each one is examined by two doctors, medical officers of the United States Public Health Service. The first doctor looks over the man for physical defects or disease; the second doctor pays more special attention to the immigrant's eyes, watches out for trachoma cases. Both men are on the alert to detect mental defects and cases of idiocy, feele-mindedness, etc. If the immigrant is passed by the doctors, he goes at once to the registry division for examination by the immigration inspectors. If anything is the matter with him, he is marked with blue chalk, with an "X" for mental or a "P" for physical. Other markings call for reexamination of the eyes or direct attention to special disabilities or suspected cases of contagious disease.

ELLIS ISLAND HOSPITALS.

The immigrants thus marked mass off into the medical division where

The immigrants thus marked pass off into the medical division, where they undergo a second and ofttimes a third examination, and if defects are found three doctors certify to the fact and the certificate is attached to the ticket. If the doctors are of opinion that the physical or mental defect is not such as to affect the immigrant's ability to earn a living, his card is stamped to show that he has been reexamined medically. Any cases which need treatment are at once sent to the Ellis Island Hospital. The hospital buildings cover nearly two-thirds of the area of the island, and are well suited for their purpose.

DEVOTED DOCTORS

There is a special hospital on what is known as the third island, where all contagious diseases are sent, and, speaking generally, the appointments are all that can be desired for the treatment of the sick. The medical staff, including doctors, nurses, attendants, etc., numbers about 160. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the work done by the doctors at Ellis Island. I can not describe it in detail in the narrow limits of this article, but it filled me with the same sort of admiration that I have felt for the Army engineers who are building the Panama Canal; the admiration one naturally feels for a combination of sheer efficiency with unlimited devotion to duty. As an instance of the extreme liberality of Congress toward its national institutions—in striking contrast with the parsimony of its pork-barrel appropriations—it may be mentioned that the work of guarding the country from disease is done at Ellis Island for the sum of eight and a fraction cents per head for the examination of each alien.

THE RIGHT TO LAND.

THE RIGHT TO LAND.

The immigrant after passing before the surgeons goes before the officials of the registry division for inspection. The registry work is the same kind that is done by the boarding officers for the cabin passengers down the bay, but at Ellis Island the primary inspection is somewhat stricter. The Inspectors stand at desks at the end of each of the long lines on the registry floor and the immigrants, after showing their cards to a "grouper," are placed by him in the line at the end of which is the manifest sheet containing their names. The inspectors question each immigrant as to the information contained in the manifest, and any serious discrepancy results in the person being held for special inquiry. If the immigrant satisfies the inspector that he is "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to land," he is forthwith given a pass and may take the next ferryboat to the Battery if his destination is New York, but if he is going to an inland point he is sent to the railroad division, where he is routed to his destination.

IN CASE OF DOUBT.

IN CASE OF DOUBT.

But if the inspectors entertain the slightest doubt as to the right of an immigrant to land they are under orders not to attempt to solve the doubt, but to hold the immigrant for special inquiry. Here also, as on board ship, a number of immigrants are temporarily detained "for their own good." These may be roughly divided into two classes: Those who have a right to land, and having railroad transportation, lack funds to support them on their way to destination, and those who are paternally held without any legal authority until their relatives come and fetch them. In the first case the friends or relatives to whom the immigrants are going are telegraphed to and the funds they provide are paid to the immigrant, who is sent forward. In this way the United States Government does a banking and money-order business of some $600,000 a year on Ellis Island.

States Government does a banking and money-order business or some $600,000 a year on Ellis Island.

THE SPECIAL INQUIRY.

The proportion of immigrants held for special inquiry varies greatly. Sometimes only 5 per cent of those on a given vessel will be so held, and at other times the number may rise to 30 per cent. The law is a complex one. It contains at least one "joker," which would enable and does enable the Government to deport without the right of appeal any alien who may be held to have any mental defect which may affect his ability to earn a living or render him likely to become a public charge.

There is room for the widest differences of opinion as to who is and who is not entitled to land, but the attitude of the department may, I think, fairly be gauged by the fact that impending motherhood is sufficient to cause an unmarried woman to be held for special inquiry, however "clearly and beyond a doubt" she may otherwise be entitled to land. Her morals must be inquired into.

A special effort is made to exclude the poor. Poverty is looked on askance at Ellis Island, and if an alien seeking admission is suspected of being a pauper he must satisfy the inspector as to his occupation, his proficiency in the same, his physical ability to pursue it, his mental aptitude therefor, the demand for labor or services of the kind he is able to render at the place to which he intends to go, the number of persons who may be dependent upon him either here or abroad, and the value of his property. If the inspector has any doubts, the alleged pauper is held for special inquiry. However, the department generously makes exceptions in favor of wives and minor children going to persons as to whom the examining inspector is satisfied that they are: First, able; second, willing; and third, legally bound to support them.

LOOKING UP RELATIVES.

The immigrants who are legally qualified to land but are temporarily detained for their own good, are sent to the information division. The cards of such immigrants are taken up as they are reached, and their names, with certain data, entered upon a sheet. Official post cards or telegrams are then sent to relatives and friends. A person calling at Ellis Island in response to such notification is subjected to almost the same kind of inquisition as the immigrant himself. He must satisfy the inspectors that he is a proper person to receive the immigrant for whom he calls and that the latter desires to go with him. Immigrants held in this division whose relatives or friends fail to call are discharged to responsible missionaries and immigrant ald societies, who ald qualified immigrants without relatives or friends here to secure employment. A few of these cases, however, are sent to the special inquiry division, which is the most extraordinary feature of the Immigration Service.

A REVOLTING PROCEEDING.

A newspaper man is not easily shocked. For nearly a quarter of a century I have followed my profession in many lands and seen many strange and pitiful things. I have heard drumhead courts-martial condemn brave men to die upon the scantiest of evidence, but I have never seen or heard anything so revolting to my sense of justice as the summary proceedings before the boards of special inquiry at Ellis Island. It is literally a star-chamber proceeding.

The immigrant is utterly helpless, is not even informed of the purposes or scope of the secret inquiry about to take place, is not allowed counsel or assistance of any kind. The immigrant is forced to testify against himself, and as no effort is made to follow the ordinary rules of evidence, is often trapped by leading questions into admissions that result in his exclusion.

A MARRIED WOMAN'S PLIGHT.

Thus I heard a married woman, who had lived in this country before and whose husband was seeking her exclusion, asked by an inspector whether since her marriage she had ever had relations with any other man, and the inspector afterwards assured me that it was his duty to put the question, because if the woman had answered it in the affirmative the board would have unanimously excluded her under section 2 of the act as a person who admitted having committed a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, to wit, adultery. And this woman was thoroughly respectable, and was admitted on the evidence of her sister, who is living in New York, the actual fact being that her marriage to her husband had never been consummated.

SEVERAL BOARDS IN SESSION.

Every day, from morning to night, there are from five to eight boards in continuous session. Each consists of three inspectors, and has at its disposal an interpreter, a messenger, and a stenographer. The daily board minutes vary in length from 150 to 250 closely typewritten pages. It is due to the inspectors of the special inquiry division to say that they do not make the law; they only apply it and carry out its provisions. They are good, red-blooded Americans. Their sympathies are nearly always with the immigrant, but they live in an atmosphere of bureaucracy which obscures their native sense of fair play and, I may add, of humor.

NO CONSTITUTION HERE.

It is urged in defense of this star-chamber proceeding that the immigration law is not criminal in its nature; that it merely determines who may and who may not land. It is also urged that the provisions of the Constitution of the United States do not apply to aliens on Ellis Island and that their status there is exactly the same as if they were on board ship. Also that admission to the United States is a privilege and not a right, and that the burden of proof is upon the person seeking admission. These contentions have in a large measure been sustained by the Federal courts. The fact remains, however, that the whole proceeding is monstrously unfair; that it is conducted in secret, or, to use the wording of the law, "separate and apart from the public." The immigrant is deprived of his liberty, refused the benefit of counsel, and forced to testify against himself under oath, and, in the event of deportation, loses virtually everything he has in the world, his money having been taken to pay for his passage, the whole without what, to an impartial mind, can possibly be termed due process of law.

In Case of Appeals.

IN CASE OF APPEAL

IN CASE OF APPEAL.

Of course, in certain cases an appeal lies from the decisions of the board of special inquiry, and these appeals vary from 15 to 60 or 70 a day. These appeals are heard by the commissioner, who has before him the stenographic record of the hearing and the immigrant himself, and he is thus able to keep in touch with what the various boards are doing. The commissioner does not decide the appeals himself, but forwards them to the Secretary of Labor in Washington, together with his recommendation.

It is fair to say that when the boards of inquiry have decided to exclude an alien for causes which may under the law be appealed, the immigrant is informed of his rights and is allowed the assistance of missionary or benevolent societies in the preparation of his appeal and may even employ counsel for this purpose.

All immigrants who have once been heard by a board of inquiry without securing admission are placed in the custody of the deporting division, irrespective of whether they have been excluded or their case has been deferred, so that there are always on the island a large number of aliens either awaiting deportation, or whose cases have been deferred by the board for the production of further evidence, or whose appeals have not been decided, and these, added to immigrants temporarily detained and placed in charge of the information division and any immigrants whose primary inspection may not have been concluded, form a large floating population. There are at times 2,000 immigrants who must be cared for and fed by the department.

THE FOOD CONTRACT.

THE FOOD CONTRACT.

The immigrants are furnished three meals a day by a contractor, who also has the privilege of selling food to the immigrants who are waiting inspection or are admitted and about to proceed to their destinations. Most of this food is supplied in ready packed boxes, which retail for 50 cents and for $1.

All meats used on the island are inspected daily by an inspector from the Department of Agriculture, and although there have been many allegations made reflecting on the food supply, I am convinced that it is, generally speaking, of excellent quality. I have found it impossible to purchase in New York the contents of the 50-cent and $1 boxes for any such price.

QUANTITY, NOT QUALITY.

QUANTITY, NOT QUALITY.

However, the contractors should be obliged to provide 10-cent and 25-cent packages of food, and the food contract under which detained immigrants are fed at a cost of 6 cents for breakfast, 8 cents for dinner, and 8 cents for supper should undoubtedly specify not only the kind of foods to be supplied, but the actual weight in ounces of bread, meat, etc., to be furnished each immigrant.

It was the quantity of meat rather than its quality that seemed to me to be open to criticism.

ON THE BARE FLOOR.

ON THE BARE FLOOR.

The worst physical condition existing on Ellis Island is undoubtedly the sleeping accommodations. There are no beds; there are no mattresses, and hundreds of immigrants sleep every night on the bare floor. What sleeping bunks there are are of iron superimposed and placed back to back, with, in some cases, wire springs, but more often wide metal slats, over which a blanket is thrown in place of a mattress.

In one room I have seen more than 300 men in the deporting division herded together—old men, young men, boys, criminals, paupers, feeble-minded, and infirm—and left all night without supervision and with a total disregard of every consideration of hygiene, morality, or common decency.

The women's quarters are no better than the men's, and although the inspectors do make their best efforts to sort out the different classes of aliens detained and to alleviate in every way the conditions and the hardships of those in their charge, it is nevertheless a fact that the immigrants are herded together at night exactly like animals.

THE WORST OF ALL HOTELS.

Congress has been apprised of these conditions time and time again, but has always refused the necessary appropriations for bettering conditions. It was stated to me that, after all, many of the immigrants were better treated at Ellis Island than they had ever been in their lives. This is undoubtedly true as regards medical assistance, their actual dealings with the inspectors, and in many cases as to the food. It is not true as to the sleeping accommodations. It is a fact that, with the exception of one small room with a tiny fron cot and a pail, there is no provision whatever for taking care of first or second cabin passengers detained on the island. It may be true that on Ellis Island Uncle Sam runs the biggest hotel in the world, but it unquestionably is the worst.

But although some immigrants are detained on the island for four or five weeks before their cases are finally disposed of, the day comes when they must either be admitted to the United States or deported at the expense of the steamship company which brought them.

A SURE THING FOR STEAMSHIPS.

One of the grossest injustices is perpetrated at the expense of the deported immigrant in connection with the head tax he has paid for admission to the country. This head tax is always paid by the immigrant himself and it is collected from immigrants by the steamship company, which pays it to the Government. When the immigrant is ordered deported the $4 is not returned to him, but is paid back to the steamship company, and more than defrays the cost of taking the immigrant back to Europe. So for every immigrant that a steamship company can induce to come it is certain of a profit even on the return voyage if the alien is rejected.

WHAT DEPORTATION IS LIKE,

The actual deportation of the immigrant would sadden the heart of any man. There you have grief, despair, the blighting of cherished hopes, the crushing out of all ambition. The only ones who do not seem to care so much are the warrant cases, generally women arrested for prostitution and about to be sent back to their native land. There is no time limit within which this may be done and much money and labor is spent in deporting such cases. But there are often heart-rending scenes when the immigrants are actually put on board the tug which is to take them from Ellis Island, and in some cases the inspectors have been assaulted by the half-frantic allens. One woman even threw her baby at the head of the inspector, and only last Tuesday another one made a frantic effort to jump overboard. Her baggage was lost and she was being deported with only the clothes on her back and without a single cent in her pocket.

THE BRIGHTER SIDE.

But in joyous contrast are the scenes one may witness when the immigrants are admitted, especially when those temporarily detained are joined to the friends and relatives that have come for them. I shall not soon forget a middle-aged Russian woman with a young child who was being held until her husband could call for her. He came, a typical Jew, with a long red beard, accompanied by an older daughter. They had been in this country some years and after a hard struggle had prospered sufficiently to bring over the rest of the family. The old man could hardly speak for excitement as he was trying to satisfy the inspectors that he was the immigrant's husband, and when they were at last placed in each other's presence his pent-up feelings gave way and great tears streamed down his face and glistened on his beard as he held in his arms the mother of his children. He was literally eating her with kisses, and she trembled so she could hardly stand. The elder daughter was on her knees clutching at her mother's dress, and it was impossible not to be affected by the sight. My heart then went out to those who had not even been given the chance to make good.

Mr. RURNETT. Now Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous cons

Mr. BURNETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] be recognized for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be recognized for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, we have gone the extreme limit in trying to meet the views of gentlemen who are pleading that the immigrant does not get a fair show when he is examined. We have inserted in this bill two new provisions. We require that when an alien is rejected by a board of special inquiry he must be informed of his right of appeal to the Secre tary of Labor. We also require that on appeal the alien shall be permitted to employ counsel. Now gentlemen propose to allow him counsel at the very time when he ought not to have counsel, at the very time when he is being taken aside, to see what his answers will be when he has no counsel at his elbow.

"Bigotry is at the bottom of this demand for the restriction of immigration," says some one. Bigotry, forsooth! Was it bigotry which impelled the legislatures of 17 States to petition for the literacy test? Was it bigotry which guided the foot-steps of Samuel Gompers to our committee room, when he came to plead for this law? Was it bigotry which caused the American Federation of Labor time and again to call upon Congress to enact this very same measure which we are now considering? Is there bigotry in the heart of Edward Dwyer, of Brooklyn, N. Y., secretary of the Irish-American Societies? Have you all forgotten his open letter to William Sulzer, praying for support for this same measure?

Call us all bigots if you so desire. Let our motives be as contemptible as you choose. Our motives, good or bad, can not add one jot to the argument against this legislation nor detract one tittle from the arguments in its favor.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY and Mr. SABATH demanded a division. The committee divided; and there were-ayes 41, noes 81. Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the word "solely" in line 16, on page 34.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 16, strike out the word "solely."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes to explain this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. A few moments ago the chairman of this committee [Mr. BURNETT] stated that these people who are rejected have the right to appeal. This is true; but this section provides that the Secretary of Labor can not take into consideration any evidence whatever on such appeal unless it was produced at the time of the trial. What do these unfortunate immigrants know of their rights in the premises? If any opportunity was given them to present the evidence which they have, in many cases this would be of sufficient merit to warrant their admission, but we first preclude them from producing evidence, and then we say to them that when the case is appealed to the secretary of Labor they can not produce any evidence that had not been produced at the hearing before the board of special inquiry. We are giving them certain remedies and making it impossible for them to avail themselves of these remedies, and therefore I hope that my amendment will prevail-that the word solely" will be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SABATH) there were 42 ayes and 67 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read section 18.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that we pass over section 19 without prejudice, as there are several Members who want to offer amendments.

Mr. MANN. Would not the gentleman take the suggestion that as it is almost 6 o'clock and there is some other business before the House, that the committee rise?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I object to passing section 19. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he intends to press this bill for passage to-night?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think it possible.
Mr. MOORE. Then, would it not be well, inasmuch as gentlemen here have done all they could to assist in the progress of the bill, to move that the committee rise?

Mr. BURNETT, I would like to have section 19 read and have that pending, because there are some matters that are important in it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to ask that section 19 be passed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that section 19 be passed without prejudice, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] objected.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we have some understanding about how far the gentleman wants to proceed if we pass over section 19.

Mr. BURNETT. I think 15 minutes longer, and especially if we can get an agreement here that Calendar Wednesday may be set aside for Thursday. I know how sacred Calendar Wednesday is, and we could not do away with it entirely, but I thought it might be possible to suspend Calendar Wednesday so as to conclude the bill to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, ever since Calendar Wednesday was established I think that has been deemed to be a violation of the public trust to set it aside for any purpose, and I shall object to that.

Mr. MANN. There is no proposition to set it aside, but to substitute Thursday for it.

Mr. MOORE. It is only diverting it for one day.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the reading of section 19 for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama again asks unanimous consent to omit reading section 19 and pass it without prejudice.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The Clerk proceeded, and read section 19 of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to ask the committee to go further to-night, except to adopt one amend-ment, and that is to insert a semicolon on page 38, line 10, after the word "law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 38, line 10, by inserting a semicolon after the word "law." The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and I would like to know if we can, by unanimous consent, postpone Calendar Wednesday to Thursday

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter which will have to be agreed to in the House.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that; but I thought if we could get unanimous consent in the committee there would be no objection in the House.

Mr. SABATH. What binding effect would it have to agree to it in the committee?

Mr. BURNETT. Not any; only I think if it was agreed to in committee gentlemen would not object to it in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hay, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6060, the immigration bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order of business to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, be transferred to Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bus-NETT] asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday, to-morrow, be transferred to Thursday.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama made that suggestion in committee, to which I made objection, but since that time the gentleman was kind enough to accommodate a number of Members of the House who were anxious to go home, by discontinuing the further consideration of the bill to-night, and I believe that if he wants the day to-morrow and have Calendar Wednesday transferred to Thursday I ought to withdraw my objection, and I do it.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 397 (H. Rept. 215).

Resolved, That when the consideration of the bill H. R. 1739 is again reached it shall be in order for the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, in lieu of said House bill, to call up for consideration the bill S. 48, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railways in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," under the same limitation for general debate as now applies to said House bill, except that the time be extended three hours.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. There is no objection to it, and it simply allows the House to consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill. There is one verbal change that I would like to suggest, however. At the end of the resolution I would like to have the language read in this way:

Except that the time be extended through the day for general debate.

That would perhaps give a little more than three hours, but it would give the full calendar day for general debate.
Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no objection to that.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the last two words of the resolution and in-serting after the word "extended" the following: "through the next day for general debate." y for general Mr. LENROOT. Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I would like the gentleman to state whether or not that would not extend the day beyond the day the bill is called up?

Mr. HENRY. No; I think it would extend it just through that day.

Mr. LENROOT. The language is the "next" day.

Mr. HENRY. I think that means the calendar day when we take the bill up for consideration.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the word "next" be stricken from the amendment, so that it will read "through the day."

Mr. HENRY. Very well; that is satisfactory. Mr. MANN. I offer that as an amendment. Mr. MANN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "next."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas as amended by the gentleman from

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amended resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill S. 2269, to fix the standard barrel for fruits, vegetables, and other commodi-ties, was changed from the Committee on Agriculture to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman in charge of the Alaska bill desires a full day, and at his request I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next the House meet at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next the House meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I understand the request is in order to accommodate gentlemen who desire to be heard in general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand there are 25 gentlemen who want to be heard, and it is in order to give them full opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing I report back a communication from the Attorney General, together with a report on the receipts and disbursements of all moneys received by the auditor of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia since his incumbency in office, and I am directed by the Committee on Printing to request that the matter be printed as a public document.

PRAYERS OF CHAPLAIN OF THE HOUSE,

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably, without amendment, House concurrent resolu-tion No. 8, providing for the printing of House Document No. 1458 of the Sixty-second Congress, and I submit a report (No. 220) thereon. There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the folding room, 50,000 copies of House Document No. 1458, Sixty-second Congress, same being "Prayers offered at the opening of the sessions of the Sixty-second Congress of the United States."

Mr. FLETCHER. On December 22, 1913, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger] submitted an article by Henry E. Davis on the relations between the Government and the District of Columbia entitled "The Workshop of the Nation," and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration. I am directed by that committee to report it back with the request that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing I report back a copy of an address by Hon. Daniel C. DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing I report back the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 104) for printing as a public document the publication of the State Department known as the Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States, with a recommendation that it do not pass. The committee submits a report, which I will ask to have read.

The report (No. 219) was read, as follows:

The report (No. 219) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 104) providing for the publication of the Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States as compiled by the State Department as a public document, report the same back with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Volumes I. II, and III of the Documentary History of the Constitution were printed as a public document (H. Dec. No. 529, 56th Cong., 2d sess.) in accordance with a concurrent resolution passed February 9, 1901. This resolution provided 2,000 sets for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for the use of the State Department. The printing and binding of these 7,000 sets cost $24,592. Subsequently, in 1905, the State Department issued two additional volumes of the Documentary History of the Constitution. These additional volumes (IV and V) did not receive any congressional distribution.

The superintendent of documents at the Government Printing Office still has on hand for sale 300 copies each of Volumes I, II, and III, and he has authority to reprint Volumes IV and V whenever there is a sufficient demand for the same. A very reasonable price (based upon the cost of reprinting) is charged for this history and it seems that anyone interested in the document ought to be willing to pay the small sum at which it is offered for sale by the superintendent of documents. Owing to the large expense involved the committee does not believe there should be any further free distribution of the publication.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the report be agreed to and course.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

Mr. SHIELDS. A few days ago an adverse report was made from the Committee on the Judiciary on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the time for the convening of Congress and commencement of the terms of the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, and leave was granted to file the views of the minority. I now present the views of the minority and ask that they be printed, and also that they may appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the views of the minority were ordered to be printed, and also to be printed in the RECORD, as [Senate Report No. 212, part 2, Sixty-third Congress, second session.] CHANGE IN TIME FOR CONVENING OF CONGRESS AND COMMENCEMENT OF TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, SENATORS, AND REPRESENTA-TIVES.

Mr. Shields (for himself, Messis. Ashurst, Nelson, Cummins, Chilton, and Fletcher), from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following views, to accompany Senate joint resolution 10. The minority recommends that the resolution, omitting formal parts, be amended so as to read as follows:

"ARTICLE XVIII.

"Section 1. The terms of the President and Vice President of the United States shall commence on the third Monday in January following the election of presidential and vice presidential electors.

"Sec. 2. The presidential and vice presidential electors, composing the Electoral College, shall assemble in the States by which they are appointed and cast their votes for President and Vice President on the second Monday in December following their appointment, and the vote so cast, duly certified, shall be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January next thereafter, and the Congress shall meet in joint session on the second Monday in January following and open and count the same: Provided, That Congress may alter all the dates fixed in this section, in its discretion.

"Sec. 3. The terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

"Sec. 4. There shall be held two regular sessions of Congress, convening on the first Monday of January each year.

"Sec. 5. The terms of said officers who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment are hereby changed to conform herewith."

The amendments of the resolution recommended are the substitution in the first section, of the "third" Monday instead of the "second" Monday in January for the commencement of the terms of the President and Vice President; the substitution of the "second" Monday for the "first" Monday in December for the meeting of electors for President and Vice President; and provisions that the vote shall be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January, and that Congress shall meet on the second Monday thereafter and open and count the vote, and authorizing Congress to change these dates; and the addition of section 4, providing for a change in the terms of the President and Vice President and Senators and Representatives in office when the constitutional amendment is adopted and becomes effective, so that they will expire with the commencement of the terms of their successors, under the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

The Constitution, Article II, section 1, ordains that the President

Constitution.

The Constitution, Article II, section 1, ordains that the President and Vice President shall hold office for the term of four years, but does not provide when the terms shall commence. The only recognition of the 4th of March succeeding the day of a presidential election as the day of the commencement of the terms of the President and Vice President is the provision in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, effective September 25, 1804, that—"If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President."

ever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President."

This would probably be construed to be a provision that the term of the President expired on the 4th of March after a presidential election—that a vacancy then exists—in which event the then Vice President succeeded to the office.

The time when the presidential electors should be elected and the date on which they shall meet and give their vote is, by Article II, section I, of the Constitution, left to the discretion of Congress, with the restriction that the day of voting shall be the same throughout the United States. An act was passed February 3, 1887, requiring them to meet and give their vote on the second Monday in January next after their appointment, in such place in each State as the legislature thereof shall direct; which vote, duly certified, to be delivered to the President of the Senate before the first Wednesday in February and be canvassed by Congress, in joint session, on the second Wednesday in February thereafter.

The Constitution, while providing that Representatives shall hold their offices for two years (Art. I, sec. 2) and Senators for six years (Art. I, sec. 3), does not provide when the terms shall commence.

The commencement of the terms of the first President and Vice President, and of the Senators and Representatives composing the First Congress, was fixed by a resolution of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, providing "that the first Wednesday in March next (which happened to be the 4th day of March) be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution."

Congress has provided (act of Mar. 1, 1792, Rev. Stat., sec. 152) that the terms of Senators and Representatives composing the electors have been given, but there seems to be no statute enacted since the adoption of the Constitution fixing the commencement of the electors have been given, but there acted since the adoption of the Constitution fixing the commencement of the terms of Senators and Representatives.

The Constitution is proposed to be amended by the resolution as follows:

1. The terms of the President and Vice President, by the first section, are made to commence on the third Monday in January instead of the 4th day of March succeeding the election of electors.

2. The electors are required, by the second section, to meet and cast their vote on the second Monday in December succeeding their appointment; the vote to be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January thereafter, and the Congress to meet, in joint session, to open and count the same on the second Monday in January succeeding. The Congress, however, is authorized to change these dates.

The provisions of this section are entirely new, the present Constitution having left these matters entirely to the discretion of Congress, and are for the purpose of preventing confusion in putting the first section into effect.

3. The terms of Senators and Representatives are, by the third section, made to commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

This provision is new, and although there is no provision in the present Constitution fixing when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence, yet those providing that their terms shall be six and two years entitle those now in office and hereafter to be elected to hold for two years after the 4th of March succeeding their election, the day when the first Senators and Representatives were qualified under the Constitution, and their terms can not be changed without a constitutional provision.

4. The fourth section merely changes the second paragraph of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, in effect, so as to provide that Congress shall meet each year, commencing on the first Monday of January instead of the first Monday in December.

5. The provisions of section 5 are temporary, and for the purpose merely of putting into effect the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, by which Senators are to be elected by the people, probably at the November election, it becomes very opportune for Congress to convene in January following. The convening of Congress on the first Monday of December, as at present, is very inopportune, as adjournment for the Christmas holidays is always taken and many Members go to their homes, returning late, which precludes any real work until January.

The reasons for the adoption of the proposed amendment are these:
First. Congress should at the earliest practicable time enact the principles of the majority of the people, as expressed in the election of each Congress. That is why the Constitution requires the election of anew Congress every two years. If it is not to reflect the sentiment of the people these frequent elections have no meaning or purpose. Any evasion of this is subversive of the fundamental principle of our Government, that the majority shall rule. No other nation in the world has its legislative body convene so long after the expression of the people upon governmental questions.

During the campaign preceding a congressional election the great questions that divide the political parties are thoroughly discussed for the purpose of determining the policy of the Government and of having the sentiments of the majority crystallized into legislation. It seems trifling with the rights of the people when their mandates can not be obeyed within a reasonable time. It is unfair to an administration that the legislation which it thinks so essential to the prosperity of the country should be so long deferred. It is true an extraordinary session may be called early, but such sessions are limited generally to one or two subjects, which of necessity make enormous waste of the time of each House, waiting for the other to consider and pass the measures.

to one or two subjects, which of necessity make enormous waste of the time of each House, waiting for the other to consider and pass the measures.

Second As the law is at the present time the second regular session does not convene until after the election of the succeeding Congress. As an election often changes the political complexion of a Congress, under the present law many times we have the injustice of a Congress that has been disapproved by the people enacting laws for the people opposed to their last expression. Such a condition does violence to the rights of the majority. A Member of the House of Representatives can barely get started in his work until the time arrives for the nominating convention of his district. He has accomplished nothing, and hence has made no record upon which to go before his party or his people. This is an injustice both to the Members and to the people. The record of a Representative should be completed before he asks an indorsement of his course.

Third. Under the present system a contest over a seat in the House of Representatives is seldom ever decided until more than half the term, and in many instances until a period of 22 months of the term, and in many instances until a period of 22 months of the term, has expired. For all that time the occupant of the seat draws the salary, and when his opponent is seated he also draws the salary for the full term; thus the Government pays for the representation from that district twice. But that is not the worst feature of the situation; during all of that time the district is being misrepresented, at least politically, in Congress.

By Congress meeting the first Monday in January succeeding the first six months of the Congress.

Fourth. The President and Vice President should enter upon the performance of their duties as soon as the new Congress can count the elections, contested-election cases can be disposed of at least during the first six months of the Congress.

Fourth. The President and Vice President should enter upon the per the will of the people, and if it is ever exercised it will likely produce a revolution.

It is true that January weather would likely be inclement for an inaugural parade, but that is a reason too insignificant to constitute an argument against a constitutional amendment which promises so much for good government. Nearly all the governors of the States are inaugurated in January. The pomp and ceremony which usually attend the coronation of monarchs are at least not necessary to a republic.

For these reasons we favor the adoption of the resolution, amended as bearing suggested.

herein suggested.

PREVENTION OF TUBERCULOSIS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The bill (S. 4370) to provide for investigations of tuberculosis and the prevention of the disease by care of consumptives in hospitals and providing for the use of abandoned military, naval, and other reservations or other Government property as tuberculosis hospitals and providing for the maintenance of such institutions was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To what committee does the Sen-

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think, Mr. President, that it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, because it deals more with abandoned military reservations than with any other property of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill could properly be referred to any one of several committees.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What is the nature of the bill? Mr. SMOOT. Let the title of the bill be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the bill by title.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no particular committee to which I desire the bill to be referred. I only desire that it shall be referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred in the first instance to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

PROHIBITION OF DIVORCES.

Mr. RANSDELL. I send to the desk a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I ask to have read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 109) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment of the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States, as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE -

"Section 1. Absolute divorce with the right to remarry shall not be permitted in the United States, or in any place within their jurisdiction.

"Uniform laws in regard to marriage, and to separation from bed and board without permission to remarry, shall be enacted for the United States and all places subject to them.

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I desire to be heard very briefly in support of the amendment.

As appears from its reading, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the dissolution of a valid marriage for any cause, though separation from bed and board, without permission to remarry, may be granted in proper cases.

At this time I deem it necessary to make only a brief observation on the great evil of divorce. The remedy by constitutional prohibition is drastic, but the malady is so fatal that nothing short of it will prove efficacious.

Practically everyone who has given the subject the slightest study admits that divorce is one of the most serious problems confronting our Republic. In the United States divorce is spreading with alarming rapidity. It has permeated every walk of life and is prevalent among every class of people. The total number of divorces granted in 1867 was 9,937, or 27 per 100,000 population. Forty years later, in 1906, there were 72,062 divorces, or 86 per 100,000; thus, in actual numbers, there were more than seven times as many divorces granted in 1906 as in 1867, or, allowing for the increased population, divorce had increased 319 per cent. To put it in another way, in 1867 there was 1 divorce for every 3,666 people, while in 1906 there was 1 for every 1,162.

If divorces multiply at the same rate in the future as in the past-and there is every indication that they will increase faster—then, before the middle of this century, we will have annually in the United States 275 divorces per 100,000 popula-tion, or 1 divorce for every 5 marriages. In 1887 there was 1 divorce for every 17 marriages; in 1906, 1 for every 12 marriages, and at the same rate we will have in 1946 the appalling figure of 1 divorce for every 5 marriages.

Our closest competitors in Europe are Switzerland, with 41 divorces annually per 100,000 population, Hungary with 35, and France with 33, according to the statistics for 1910 and 1911, while Japan has 215 divorces to our 86.

To make a most striking comparison, during 1901 the total number of divorces granted in the United States was more than twice as great as in all the rest of Christendom combined; yes, actually more than two times as many divorces among 75,-000,000 Americans that year as among the 400,000,000 souls of Europe and other Christian countries.

England stands in bold contrast with this country. In 1911 she granted a total of only 655 divorces, or 1½ per 100,000; while in 1906 the United States allowed 72,062 divorces, or 86 per 100,000. During the 20 years ending with 1906 Ireland had only 19 divorces, or an average of less than one absolute divorce per year for her entire population of 4,500,000.

If the United States were to write in the Constitution an amendment prohibiting absolute divorce it would not be taking such a radical step as might at first be thought, but would be following a beaten path.

The State of South Carolina-all honor to her-forbids divorce. It is absolutely prohibited in Italy, Spain, and to twothirds of the population of Austria-Hungary, while the Latin-American countries of Mexico, Argentine Republic, Brazil, Peru, Chile, and others have similar laws. A legal separation, how-ever, without the right to remarry, is recognized in all of these jurisdictions. In Canada the important Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Newfoundland, and the Northwest Territories have no divorce laws, though divorce may be obtained in exceptional cases by special act of the Canadian Parliament. From 1867 to 1909-a period of 42 years-these Provinces had only 140 absolute divorces.

It can not be gainsaid that divorce destroys the home, and the home is the base and foundation of the State; hence we must stop divorce or ruin the State, which can not continue to exist if its base is allowed to crumble and fall.

While many excellent people are divorced, and some of them make new homes, the inevitable trend of divorce is to break up many more homes than it builds up, and to materially, reduce the number of children. When marriage is dissolved the true home ceases to exist, the parents and children are separated, and the sweet ties that bind father and mother to their offspring and to each other are broken forever.

As long as the Romans of old looked upon marriage as sacred and held the sanctity of the home inviolate, their arms were invulnerable, and Rome became mistress of the world. with the accumulation of colossal wealth came great laxity of morals, marriage became a jest, and childbearing a useless burden. The luxurious Romans lost all respect for female chastity, the heroic virtues of their early years were forgotten, and the Empire fell, the victim of luxury and disregard for the binding effects of marriage. Shall not the United States take warning from Rome's example?

I appeal to all patriotic citizens-good men of every creed and of no creed-to unite in urging the adoption of my amendment, which has for its object the preservation of the home, aye, sir, the preservation of the Republic; home, which gave us our earliest and best lessons in morality; home, where we were taught to love, honor, and obey our parents, and all lawful superiors; home, where we received our first idea of government, a little state in which our fond parents were the rulers and we, their children, were willing subjects; home, the greatest protection from anarchy, the strongest defense against socialism, and the chief bulwark of society; home, the maker of good citizens and the model on which every wise government is

COMPILATION OF NAVAL LAWS.

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution (S. Res. 262) was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to prepare and submit to the Senate at its next regular session, or as soon thereafter as practicable, a compilation of existing laws relating to the Navy, Navy Department, and Marine Corps, with annotations showing how such laws have been construed and applied by the Navy Department, the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Attorney General, or the courts, the cost of said compilation to be covered by appropriations to be reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TILLMAN. In connection with the resolution I present a letter from the Secretary of the Navy urging the need of an annotated compilation of naval laws, which I ask may be printed to accompany the resolution, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to give notice that during the next legislative day I shall offer the following amendment to Rule XXV of the standing rules of the Senate:

Amend Rule XXV of the standing rules of the Senate by adding after the clause "A Committee on Expenditures in the War Department to consist of five Senators" the following:

"The above-named committees on expenditures in the several departments shall have within their jurisdiction the following subjects: The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands; retrenchment; the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of the pay of officers."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN 1.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 249, reported by Mr. Walsh, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 21, 1914, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That FRANK P. GLASS is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss this resolution, but the vigor and earnestness of those who spoke yesterday in opposition to it have impelled me at least briefly to state the grounds upon which I intend to support it.

It has been argued here that the provisions of the seventeenth amendment are such that they do not go into operation, so far as the election of Senators by the people is concerned, until the expiration of the term of office for which each of the sitting Members of the Senate was elected. It seems to me that even if we accept the view of those who take that position as to the construction of the word "affect" and the word "term" in the seventeenth amendment the conclusion to which they come does not by any means follow.

The seventeenth amendment provides as follows:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years.

If we were to stop there, the language would be sufficiently broad to cover the cases of all Members who are now sitting or who were sitting at the time the amendment was adopted. The language is very comprehensive. Let me repeat it:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years.

The moment the seventeenth amendment went into operation that provision of it became controlling, namely, that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people. Obviously, however, if that were carried out, according to the broad language in which it is stated, it would result in a great deal of confusion. In order to obviate the broad construction that might have been given to that language if it had been allowed to stand alone, this further provision was

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

I think the object of that provision of the seventeenth amendment was simply to prevent the general provision with reference to the election of Senators by the people from being so con-struct as to legislate out of office any Member who then occu-pled a seat in the Senate. That has been the view of the provision, as I understand, ever since it was first introduced. Substantially the same amendment was before the House of Representatives in 1802. The provision I have last read, that the amendment should not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it became valid as part of the Constitution, was contained in the resolution reported to the House in 1892 in precisely the same language.

The report of the committee of the House which had this matter under consideration and which reported the resolution, with reference to this provision, states as follows—and I read from Report No. 368 of the Fifty-second Congress, first session,

House of Representatives:

That the title of no Senator may be affected who, at the time of the adoption of the amendment, holds his seat at the hands of the legislature of his State as now provided by the Constitution, the last provision is inserted out of abundant caution.

So, clearly, it was the view of that committee that this provision had the effect I have stated, namely, to prevent any sitting Member being legislated out of his seat, and it was not intended to have any further effect than that.

That report was considered by the House. It has been before the various other committees that have considered the same resolution, or resolutions substantially like it, from time to time since, and I never heard it questioned until after the seventeenth amendment was adopted that that was the intention of this saving clause and that that was all that was intended by it.

If the other construction should prevail-that is, the construction contended for by the proponents of the right of Mr. Glass to his seat—we should be in the rather curious situation that although the amendment provides that the Senate shall consist of two Members from each State, elected by the people, the amendment after its adoption would go into operation by piecemeal. With reference to those Senators whose terms expire in the year 1915 it would go into operation upon March 4, 1915. With reference to those Senators whose terms expire in 1917, its operation would be delayed for two years, and it would not go into operation until the later date. With reference to those whose terms expire in 1919 it would be delayed With referfor four years, and would not go into operation until 1919. Indeed, in the case of a Senator who was elected from the State of Louisiana by the legislature prior to the adoption of this amendment, but who has not yet taken his seat, the amendment would not go into operation until 1921. Thus we should have Senators coming along here, part of them elected by the legislatures of some of the States and part of them elected by the people of some of the other States.

Certainly no such result as that could have been within the contemplation of either those who framed the amendment or those who adopted it. I venture to say that when this resolu-tion was under consideration in either House, if it had been suggested that that would be the construction of it, it would have been amended so as to make it clear that no such construction could have been possible.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do. Mr. GOFF. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to this amendment as it was proposed to the Congress. I read the original joint resolution:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

Was not that a clear expression of the Congress of the United States that eo instanti on the ratification of this amendment the provisions of the old Constitution relating to the filling of vacancies were absoluely eliminated? That is an expression of the Senate and an expression of the House, and that is the particular language that was submitted to the States. As I understand, "in lieu of " means "in place of." Therefore on the ratification of the seventeenth amendment did not the provisions here stand in place of the old Constitution, and are they not absolutely eliminated from our consideration?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, Mr. President, I quite agree with the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia. He suggests a very strong point, and one that has been overlooked, because we have not carried into the amendment as it has been printed the introductory provision to which the Senator calls attention.

Mr. GOFF.

Mr. GOFF. It seems to me it should have been done. Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps it should have been, because it helps in the interpretation of the language itself. As the Senator from West Virginia very well says, this amendment was proposed in lieu of the provision of the Constitution which provides for electing Senators by the legislatures. When it was adopted, it not only affirmatively provided for a new method of electing Senators—namely, by the people—but it negatively eliminated and put an end to that provision of the Constitution which provided that Senators should be elected by the legislatures

But, Mr. President, I do not intend to take up further time in discussing that phase of the case, because it has been so well covered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh], with whose views I entirely agree, that it is wholly unnecessary for me to go over the same ground. If, however, the view which is announced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley] and those who agree with him as to the construction of this saving clause is to be followed, I do not see how it helps their case.

It is argued that the word "term" is to be construed impersonally; that it does not mean the tenure of the sitting Member; that it means the term of office of the sitting Member; and that when the clause says that nothing in the amendment is to be construed so as to affect the term of a Senator it means that it is not to be construed to affect that term considered in an entirely impersonal way. Definitions are read of the word "term," that it means a period of time, and is to be considered, as I have said, purely impersonally, dissociated from the in-dividual who for the time being may fill the term.

Let us consider it in that way-that the word "term" is to be interpreted to mean a period of time, and that nothing in the amendment is to be construed so as to affect that period of time. How can you affect a period of time? You can affect it only by making it longer or by making it shorter. How is the period of time affected by changing from electing the Senator by a vote of the legislature to electing him by a vote of the people? You have simply thereby changed the method of filling the period of You have affected the method of filling the period of time, but you have not affected the period of time itself.

So it seems to me that even if we accept that view of the construction, the provision that the people shall elect has not affected the term—the period of time; it has simply affected the manner in which the term shall be filled.

It seems to me that if the Senate is capable of establishing precedents the vote of the Senate upon the Lee case has established that this saving clause is not to be given the construction which is now contended for, because if it is to be given that con-struction, then the governor of Maryland should have appointed Mr. Lee or somebody else instead of calling an election. If that construction is to be followed, this provision of the seventeenth amendment with reference to an election by the people did not go into effect until the end of Senator Rayner's term, and that would not occur until the year 1917. So by voting to seat Mr. Lee we have effectually declared against the construction which I have been discussing of the seventeenth amendment, which is contended for by those who are in favor of seating Mr. Glass.

That brings me for a very brief discussion to the Alabama statute which has been referred to. It is urged, passing the point I have just discussed, that there is statutory authority in Alabama for an appointment by the governor under the proviso to the seventeenth amendment, which I will read:

Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to nake temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

I do not doubt that if the Legislature of Alabama, in anticipation of the adoption of this amendment, had recited that whereas this amendment was pending, and whereas it contained a provision that the legislature might authorize temporary appointments to be made, therefore be it enacted that in the event of the adoption of the seventeenth amendment the governor be authorized to make temporary appointments pending an election by the people, that legislation would have been valid and should have been upheld.

But that is not what was done. Here is a piece of legislation which evidently was not passed in anticipation of the adoption of the seventeenth amendment. It was passed in 1909, before the seventeenth amendment had been submitted to the people. That amendment was not under consideration; it was not thought of by the Legislature of Alabama. The statute provides generally-

That when any office of the State, of any county, or municipality therof, is vacant from death, resignation, removal from the municipality, county, or State, or because the former incumbent absconds, or because an incumbent has been removed for ineligibility, or when the office is vacant from any other cause, and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office, the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

There are two reasons which seem to me conclusive that this statute can not authorize the governor to make this appointment: First, because it is limited in its terms to officers of the State or of the county or municipality, and a United States Senator is neither; second, because it provides that an appointment shall be made for the unexpired term of such office when the constitutional provision limits the authority of the legislature to empower the executive to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancy by election as the legislature may direct.

It has been argued here strenuously that a United States Senator is an officer of the State. No authority has been cited which expressly holds that. The case of Burton against The United States is referred to as sustaining that doctrine; but, as I shall attempt to show in a moment, it not only does not hold that, but all the implications to be drawn from the case are to the contrary.

How are we to determine whether an officer holds an office under the State or under the United States? There is one fundamental test to determine when an individual holds an office as distinguished from an employment, for example. An officer exercises a part of the sovereign power, either the sovereign power which has been vested in the legislative department, or the executive department, or the judicial department, or it may be in some instances more or less a combination of two or of all three; but the fundamental test of what constitutes an officer is that he exercises a part of the sovereign power.

Let me call attention to one or two decisions upon that subject. The case of The State against Hocker, reported in Sixty-third American State Reports, page 174, was a case decided by the Supreme Court of Florida. The portion of it which I read is a quotation from the advisory opinion of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Maine to the governor of that State:

of the Supreme Court of Maine to the governor of that State:

We apprehend that the term "office" implies a delegation of a possible of the sovereign power to and possession of it by the person filing the office; and the exercise of such power within legal limits constitutes the correct discharge of the duties of such office. The power thus delegated and possessed may be a portion belonging sometimes to one of the three great departments and sometimes to another; still it is a legal power which may be rightfully exercised, and in its effects it will bind the rights of others and be subject to revision and correction only according to the standing laws of the State.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If it does not delay the Senator, will he state what were the facts in the Maine case? Has the Senator looked into the facts?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I have not the Maine case before me. What I have is simply this quotation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Merely a quotation, without knowing the facts, can not be very essential.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Most of these cases arose over the question as to whether the person whose rights were involved was holding an office or an employment. That was the question. I will point the application of what I am saying, however, to this case in a moment.

Again, in the same case, quoting from Nineteenth American and English Encyclopedia of Law, the general statement is made:

The term "office" implies a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power to and possession of it by the person filling the office, a public office being an agency for the State, and the person whose duty it is to perform the agency being a public officer.

In a note to that case, which I presume was prepared by the editor of the series—Mr. Freeman, a very able lawyer and a very careful editor—this general statement is made, and there are a very large number of cases cited in support of it, at page 183:

The primary, necessary, and fundamental test of an office is that it should involve the exercise of some portion of the sovereign power of the State.

And again:

An office is a public position to which a portion of the sovereignty of the country, either legislative, executive, or judicial, attaches for the time being, and which is exercised for the benefit of the public.

If we accept that definition, which seems to be concurred in by all the authorities, that the primary and fundamental thing which must always exist in order to constitute an office is that the person filling it shall exercise a portion of the sovereign power, then we come to the question as to whether or not a United States Senator in that sense is an officer. Clearly he is, because he exercises a portion of the sovereign power. Having determined that he is an officer because he exercises such power, the inquiry next suggests itself: Of what sovereignty is he an officer? Does he exercise the sovereignty of the State? Clearly not. He discharges no State function. He owes no enforceable duty to his State. His State can not call him to account. The sovereign powers of the State from which he is accredited are vested in the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. Clearly he exercises no legislative power of the State, no judicial power of the State, and no executive power of the State. But he exercises sovereignty, and that is the sovereignty of the United States. He owes his office to the Constitution of the United States. His duties are to be performed here. Exercising the sovereignty of the United States, clearly, as it seems to me, he must be regarded as an officer of the United States.

Mr. President, reference has been made to the Burton case, to the point that a Senator of the United States is not an officer of the United States. I do not think that case maintains any such doctrine. I read from page 369, volume 202, of the Supreme Court Reports:

Allusion has been made to that part of the judgment declaring that the accused, by his conviction, "is rendered forever hereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit"—

Now mark-

"under the Government of the United States."

Not from holding an office of the United States but from holding any office under the Government of the United States. The court proceeds:

court proceeds:

That judgment, it is argued, is inconsistent with the constitutional right of a Senator to hold his place for the full term for which he was elected, and operates of its own force to exclude a convicted Senator from the Senate, although that body alone has the power to expel its Members. We answer that the above words, in the concluding part of the judgment of conviction, do nothing more than declare or recite what, in the opinion of the trial court, is the legal effect attending or following a conviction under the statute. They might well have been omitted from the judgment. By its own force, without the aid of such words in the judgment, the statute makes one convicted under it incapable forever thereafter of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States. But the final judgment of conviction did not operate, ipso facto, to vacate the seat of the convicted Senator nor compel the Senate to expel him or to regard him as expelled by force alone of the judgment. The seat into which he was originally inducted as a Senator from Kansas could only become vacant by his death or by expiration of his term of office or by some direct action on the part of the Senate in the exercise of its constitutional powers. This must be so for the further reason that the declaration in section 1782, that anyone convicted under its provisions shall be incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit "under the Government of the United States," refers only to offices created by or existing under the direct authority of the National Government as organized under the Constitution, and not to offices the appointments to which are made by the States, acting separately, albeit proceeding, in respect of such appointments, under the sanction of that instrument.

In other words, the court does not hold, and from nothing

In other words, the court does not hold, and from nothing which it says can it be implied, that the court understood that a United States Senator was an officer of the State or was not an officer of the United States, but only that this section of the statute applies to that class of offices which are created by or exist under the direct authority of the National Government as organized under the Constitution. In other words, the statute was never intended to apply to the case of a United States Senator, since he is an officer of the United States who owes his office to the provisions of the Constitution and not to the direct authority of the National Government as organized under the Constitution.

While the Senate, as a branch of the legislative department, owes its existence to the Constitution and participates in passing laws that concern the entire country, its Members are chosen by State legislatures, and can not properly be said to hold their places "under the Government of the United States."

That is very far from holding that a United States Senator is not an officer of the United States. The court simply holds that a United States Senator was not such an officer as to come within the terms of section 1782 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Utah yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ashurst in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not the Senator from Utah think that the implied conclusion of the court there is that a United States Senator is rather an officer of the State than an officer of the United States? Does the Senator think, that the court distinguished there between an "officer of the United States" and an "officer under the Government of the United States"? Does not the Senator from Utah think, from the language which he has last read, that the implied conclusion of the court is that a United States Senator is a State officer?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been, in my feeble way, trying to urge the exact opposite of that. I do not think the court undertook to hold anything of the sort.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the court points out the fact that a United States Senator draws his authority from the State, that he represents the State, that he resigns to the State; and for these reasons I ask, does it not seem to the Senator that the conclusion may at least be reasonably implied that the court intended to say that a United States Senator is rather a State officer than a United States officer?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President, the court very clearly was undertaking to distinguish between that class of officers of the United States whose office could be said to be created by or exist under the direct authority of the United States Government and that class of officers of the United States who owed their office directly to the Constitution or to the acts of the State government under the Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. One further question. Does not the Senator think that both in fact and in law every officer of the United States must be an officer under the Government of the United

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not in the sense of that statute, as the Supreme Court very clearly says. The court very clearly and very pointedly says that that provision of the statute, section

Refers only to the officers created by or existing under the direct-I emphasize the word "direct"; the court does notunder the direct authority of the National Government as organized-

And so on. Then the court says:

And not to offices

Still speaking of officers of the United States-

And not to offices the appointments to which are made by the States, acting separately, albeit proceeding, in respect of such appointments, under the sanction of that instrument—

Namely, the Constitution. Very clearly, it seems to me, recognizing these two classes of United States officers, one of which was included within section 1782 and the other not, because the language of the statute is "under the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, the only remaining question which I desire to discuss, and that very briefly, is that the statute, even if it should be held to apply to a United States Senator, does not authorize the governor to make this appointment, because the statute provides that the governor is not only empowered but is required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such officer. Under the provisions of the seventeenth amendment clearly no governor can be authorized by the act of the legislature to appoint any person to fill the unexpired term; or the legislature, rather, can only authorize him to appoint under the authority of the seventeenth amendment, which reads:

That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

The constitutional provision contemplates that the appointment shall be made only until at some convenient time before the expiration of the term the people can act; and the legislature is not permitted by the terms of the constitutional provision to authorize the governor to appoint for any longer period. The Legislature of Alabama in passing the statute which I have read evidently intended to provide for the appointment of a person to fill out the unexpired term, in order to avoid calling an election. Instead of carrying out the purpose of the Federal Constitution, which is that it is only a temporary appointment that is to be authorized, and that the primary thing to be always borne in mind is that the term shall be filled by the people, exactly the opposite was in the mind of the Legislature of Alabama, namely, to compel the governor, because it not only empowers him but it requires him to appoint a person to fill out the unexpired term in order that the calling of an election by the people, which is contemplated by the seventeenth amendment, should be entirely obviated.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.
Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Utah think that that affects the power of appointment? Does he not rather think, if the Alabama statute conflicts with the Constitution as to the duration of the service of the appointee, that the Alabama statute would yield, and that the effect would be to conform the time of service to the constitutional provision?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, the Senator means the Alabama statute, although it requires the governor to appoint a person to fill the unexpired term, should be construed to limit is power to the making of a temporary appointment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; by the provision of the Constitution-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was just about to come to that. Mr. ROBINSON. The seventeenth amendment of the Consti-tution of the United States so narrowing and limiting the Alabama act, and being paramount to the statute of Alabama.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the seventeenth amendment con-templates that the legislature shall legislate in accordance with its terms and provide for a temporary appointment. the legislature has not legislated in accordance with the terms of the seventeenth amendment; it has gone entirely beyond them. I recognize the principle which the Senator from Arkansas evidently has in mind, that a statute containing a number of provisions, some of them void and some of them valid, may be separated so as to permit the valid parts to go into operation and the void parts to be ignored; but that is only justified where the void parts to be ignored; but that is only justined where the statute is capable of separation. Here is a single, distinct provision, namely, that the governor shall appoint to fill the unexpired term. How can you separate that provision into any elements? It is a complete thing, incapable of separation. It is exactly the case which the Supreme Court had before it under the first employer's liability law which we passed. That was a law which was drawn in such comprehensive terms that it included both interstate commerce and intrastate commerce. The Supreme Court said that that was an indivisible thing: that that was a single proposition, and that it was incapable of separation. Let me read to the Senator from Arkansas what the Supreme Court said in that case.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am familiar with the decision to which the Senator refers, and I think he has stated with entire correctness the proper conclusion to be arrived at from that decision. I make no issue with him on that whatever. I reassert the proposition, however, with the permission of the Senator from Utah. that under the case of Neal against Delaware, reported, I think, in One hundred and third United States, and other cases, if a conflict arises between the statute of Alabama and the constitutional provision with reference to the duration of the service of an appointee, conceding in the beginning that the governor has the power to appoint, the only effect of the constitutional provision would be to narrow and restrict the term of service. It would not deprive the governor of the State of the power of distinguishing-and I know that the Senator from Utah would so distinguish in a case that appealed to him-between the power to appoint and the length of service of the appointee after he had been appointed. In the case of Neal against Delaware

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President

Mr. ROBINSON. Just one moment, and I will not interrupt the Senator again.

If I remember correctly, that case involved the construction of the fifteenth amendment, providing that no person shall be deprived of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The State of Delaware, by its statutes, and I believe by a constitutional provision also, had limited the right to vote to all male white persons over a certain age. In construing the fifteenth amendment, the Delaware statute, and the constitutional provision to which I have referred, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Neal's case, stated that the effect of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution was simply to read out of the Delaware statute and constitu-tion the word "white." The people of Delaware then went tion the word "white." The people of Delaware then went ahead and held an election, and all persons comprehended within the provisions of the fifteenth amendment were permitted to vote at that election. I think that the principle announced in the Neal case governs the question which the Senator from Utah is now presenting.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not think so or I would not have been contending as I have been. I think this case is governed by the principle which was laid down by the court in the Employers' Liability case, and the court itself, as is plainly stated in the case, followed a long line of cases.

court said :

The principles of construction invoked are undoubted, but are inapplicable. Of course, if it can be lawfully done, our duty is to construe the statute so as to render it constitutional. But this does not imply, if the text of an act is unambiguous, that it may be rewritten to accomplish that purpose. Equally clear is it, generally speaking, that where a statute contains provisions which are constitutional and others which are not effect may be given to the legal provisions by separating them from the illegal. But this applies only to a case where the provisions are separable and not dependent one upon the other, and does not support the contention that that which is indivisible may be divided.

Mr. ROBINSON rose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator will let me proceed. The court continues:

Moreover, even in a case where legal provisions may be severed from those which are illegal, in order to save, the rule applies only where it is plain that Congress would have enacted the legislation with the unconstitutional provisions eliminated. All these principles are so clearly settled as not to be open to controversy. They were all, after a full review of the authorities, restated and reapplied in a recent case. (Illinois Central Railroad v. McKendree, 203 U. S., 514, and authorities there cited.)

In the first place, this provision of the Alabama statute is incapable of subdivision; it is a complete and a single proposition; it can not be divided. If we apply the other test, we arrive at the same result.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I call the Senator's attention—Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. The court said:

Even in a case where legal provisions may be severed from those which are fliegal, in order to save, the rule applies only where it is plain that Congress would have enacted the legislation with the unconstitutional provisions eliminated.

In other words, it is always a question of legislative intendment. These provisions being separable, if the court can plainly see from all the surrounding circumstances that the legislature intended to enact the statute in its constitutional aspect, then it will uphold it in that aspect; but here the very reasons which impelled the Alabama Legislature to provide that the governor shall appoint for the unexpired term-for the very purpose of cutting out the interposition of a special election—that very situation precludes our concluding that the Alabama Legislature would have passed it in any other form.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, may I interrupt the Senator once

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator wishes to ask me a question, I will yield; but I should like to get through.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to ask the Senator if he has considered in this connection the case of Scott against Flowers, reported in Sixty-first Nebraska, at page 624, and the case of the Sinking Fund Commissioners against George, reported in One hundred and fourth Kentucky, at page 260?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I have not read those cases.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I have not read those cases. Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me for two or three minutes, I think

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me for just a moment, I am nearly through, and I will then yield the floor. Mr. ROBINSON. Just let me complete this sentence-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Utah will permit me to call his attention to these two cases, I wish to say that I think they are exactly in point and sustain the position which I have taken. I thought it proper, having first interrupted the Senator concerning the subject, to call his attention to those If, however, the Senator desires to conclude his two cases. remarks without further interruption, I shall not trespass

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course I do not object to the Senator interrupting me and calling my attention to those cases, but from a brief statement of them, not being familiar with the cases, I would not undertake to at once reply to him. I should want to look at the cases and to examine them with more care before I should feel warranted in undertaking to discuss or analyze them. What I am saying about this case I am basing upon the authorities with which I am familiar, and not upon cases that I know nothing about. There are a multitude of decisions with reference to this particular question and there are many shades of view with reference to it; but the Supreme Court of the United States has followed the line of decisions which I think is most consonant with reason, and I am undertaking in my argument to follow that court and not the State Courts that may have decided otherwise upon the question.

So. Mr. President, it seems to me that in any view this statute does not warrant an appointment by the governor of the State, first, because a United States Senator clearly is not a State officer, and second, because the statute as drawn is clearly opposed to the provisions of the seventeenth amendment.

I have just another word to say, and that is with reference to the argument that, if the seventeenth amendment be given the construction which is contended for by those who are supporting this resolution, the States will be denied their equal representation in the Senate. The provision that no State shall be denied its equal representation in the Senate is found in the clause of the Constitution dealing with the subject of amendments. That clause provides that amendments to the Constitution may be made in a certain way, but it provides that "no State"—meaning of course by an amendment—"without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

When we come to consider the history leading up to and the circumstances surrounding the adoption of that provision in the Federal Constitution, it becomes perfectly clear what was intended. There was a jealousy between the large States and the small States; the smaller States were fearful that, if representation was based upon population, sooner or later they would be submerged by the vast numbers of the larger States; and this provision was a compromise. Members of the House of Repreentatives being elected in proportion to population and the Members of the Senate being elected by States, each State was to have two Members in the Senate; and in order that that equality of representation from each State might never be departed from without the consent of every State, this provision in the amendment clause of the Constitution was inserted. That clause would only be violated if we should provide by an amendment, either in express terms or by necessary implication, that one State should have three Senators and another State only two, or one State five Senators and another State only one. It was not put in there as a guaranty that each State should always have here upon the floor of the Senate each of its two Members, but it was simply to prohibit an amendment to the Constitution which would deny one State the same representation which was accorded to other States. The seventeenth amendment, interpreted as I think it should be interpreted, does not affect the equal representation in the Senate.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator. Mr. WORKS. I take it that that clause in the Constitution simply provides that a State shall not be deprived of its representation here by law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. WORKS. It has nothing to do with the question of admitting or refusing to admit a Member upon the floor where the question arises as to whether or not he is legally entitled to be admitted here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Obviously not. The amendment clause is drawn broadly, so as to permit the Constitution to be amended in any imaginable way, save that one way, namely, that no amendment shall be adopted which shall deprive a State, without its consent, of its equal representation in the Senate. We have had cases under the old provisions of the Constitution where for nearly two years a State has had upon this floor only one Senator; indeed, there was one case where a State had no Senator upon the floor for a period, I think, of over a year. That was the State of Delaware. There is nothing in the Constitution which guarantees that each State shall have two Senators here all the time. If there was not full representation, it was the fault of the State itself; it was the fault of the agents of the State. The governor has been given the power to appoint in certain contingencies, and if he neglects to appoint the State has not its equal representation upon the floor. It has not, however, been deprived of its equal representation by any amendment to the Constitution, but by its own act. So that the fact that the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution requires legal machinery in order to put it into full operation does not deprive a State of its representation. Every State is upon an equality, and every State can have its representatives here by complying with the conditions of the seventeenth amendment and passing legislation. So it seems to me, Mr. President, that upon any of the grounds which have been urged the position taken by the majority of the committee is unassailable.

Mr. SHERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President-

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Arkansas wishes to refer to his authorities, so as to follow the Senator from Utah in consecutive order? If so, I have no objection to yielding for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Illinois will yield for just a few moments, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will be more readable and accessible in the RECORD if it is done in that way.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, referring to the last feature of the discussion by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], there are two State cases cited by Mr. Evins, legal adviser to the governor of Alabama, which, in my judgment, are almost exactly in point. The constitution of the State of Nebraska authorized the commitment to the Reform School of Nebraska of children under the age of 16 years. The Legislature of Nebraska passed a statute providing for the commitment of children under the age of 18 years. Upon a consideration by the Supreme Court of Nebraska of the constitutionality of that statute, the court used this language, which, I think, is exactly in point upon the question which the Senator from Utah was discussing when I last interrupted him:

when I last interrupted him:

The legislature has clearly here expressed its will, but it has gone too far; it has transcended the limits of its authority. It has, in an unmistakable manner, signified its purpose not only to authorize the commitment to the reform school of certain children under 16 years of age, but also children beyond that age, who, although guiltless of crime, have evinced a criminal tendency and are without proper parental restraint. The legislature having declared its will, and its command to the courts being in part valid and in part void, the decisive question is, Shall section 5 be given effect so far as it is in accord and agreement with the paramount law? It seems that both good sense and judicial authority require that the question should receive an affirmative answer. (Scott v. Flowers, 61 Nebr., 620, 624.)

The other case to which I referred is the case of Sinking

The other case to which I referred is the case of Sinking Fund Commissioners v. George (104 Ky., 260), and I quote from the brief of Mr. Evins in that case:

The act construed created a board of penitentiary commissioners, and provided that, of the first board, one should hold for two years, one for four years, and one for six years, and that their successors should be elected for six years. The constitution forbade the creation of officers with a longer term than four years. The act was held to create a four-year term and to be valid as so modified.

In discussing that act the Supreme Court of Kentucky said:

The language employed shows that the general assembly was willing that one of the commissioners should hold his office for six years—two years longer than the constitution will permit. As the general assembly expressed a willingness that one of the commissioners should hold for two years longer than the constitution permits, it is certainly reasonable to conclude that it was the will of that body that the commissioners should hold for four years, as this term is necessarily included in the longer one which is fixed. To hold the act void in so far as it makes the term six years instead of four, still the balance of the act is complete and enforceable. The purpose and intent of the general assembly that the commissioners should manage and control the penitentiaries can be effectuated by eliminating from the act that part which attempted to make terms six instead of four years.

Paraphrasing the language of the court in that case, it is certainly clear that the legislature intended and designed that the appointee of the governor should hold as long as the provision of the seventeenth amendment permits him to hold. Indeed, the objection that is raised is that under the Alabama statute he is permitted to hold longer than the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution authorizes him to hold.

So the doctrine of this Kentucky case and the doctrine of the Nebraska case are in accord with the principles I asserted when I interrupted the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no desire to examine judicial decisions. This is a court of original, exclusive, and final jurisdiction on this subject. The Supreme Court of the United States, which sits at convenient intervals not many hundred feet from this Chamber, can, within its proper jurisdiction, decide by final adjudication any matters committed to its care. We are required in this Chamber to do the same thing. From the decision made by this body there is no appeal. There is nothing which will set aside the judgment entered in the individual case of the person seeking admission into this Chamber. There is an appeal, however, to the only supreme court I know of in American politics, and that is the voters of the States that are concerned in this precedent.

This precedent, once made, will be a guideboard for any future controversies of like kind that may arise for some five years. There are in this body 94 sitting Senators elected under the old or original Constitution. These 94 Senators all furnish potential grounds for contests of this kind. In the event of death, resignation, or removal there would be a like question presented, provided the governors of some 46 or 47 States should take the same view of their powers and their duties that the governor of the State of Alabama has taken.

Because of that precedent, I do not care for the effect of judicial decisions. Within the province of their appointed power I yield the most implicit respect and obedience to the courts of last resort. In this case I give them no binding force whatever. Except by the innate force of their reasoning they have nothing to do with the decisions of this Chamber. If there is any good sense, any sound principle that attaches to the reasoning of these opinions, they are of value here. Further than that they furnish no information to guide a Senator to a just conclusion.

Because of the character of this precedent, governing all the potential contests that may arise hereafter, I voted some days ago contrary to what would be a matter of personal choice, if that were to settle the question. I voted contrary to my political belief, if that were to settle the question; I voted contrary to my desire to accommodate a most estimable gentleman, if that were to settle the question; but none of them does. In making a precedent I know of but one guide for a Senator. It is to make one that will stand the test of time, one on which he can justify himself, not only by the force of reasoning but by the results of that reasoning when applied to governmental operation,

I know, as other Senators here know—some of them much better than I do—the purposes of the seventeenth amendment. It was essentially remedial in character. It was designed to change vitally the method of selecting Members of this body. It did change the methods that had been in vogue for the 127 years of our national existence under the original Constitution.

I am of the opinion, Mr. President, and I believe it is borne out by text-writers—not alone judicial decisions, but text-writers—and by those who have given thought to the subject in legislative bodies—tribunals like the Senate—that in matters of constitutional revision or amendment, like the seventeenth amendment, there can be but offe conclusion. When an amendment covering the entire subject, or when an entirely revised constitution is substituted for a former provision or for a former constitution, the former constitution or former provision ipso facto ceases to exist.

For 127 years Senators had been elected by the legislatures of the several States. For some time the amendment was agitated. I shall not go at length into the merits or demerits of that controversy. It is settled. It serves no useful purpose here, save as it may shed light upon the motives, first, of those who drew the amendment and afterwards those who adopted it.

Let me premise here with the statement that I do not agree with some of the Senators who say that it is material if it were the intention of those who drew this amendment that these vacancies should be filled by the governor; that it was the purpose of those who wrote it or are responsible for its draft that like action should be had to that taken by the governor of Alabama. I do not think that makes any difference. I do not care what was the purpose of the man who drew the amendment. If every Senator here who drew it or had anything to do with it, if every Member of the House of Representatives who finally voted for its submission, agreed with the contention of those who support the admission of Mr. Glass, it would not control in this case.

I do not care what the intention of the Senate was. It is immaterial what the intention of the House of Representatives was. They did not make the amendment. It possessed no vitality when it left the Senate. It had in it no breath of life when it left the House of Representatives as a joint resolution. It was afterwards submitted—to what? To the Senators? To the Representatives? No! All they did was to exercise a discretion about how and when it should be submitted, to control its language. After they so controlled its language by writing it in a given form, it went out to the 48 States for ratification or rejection in that exact form.

It is immaterial what Congress had in mind. What I am trying to discover is, What did the people of, or the legislatures of, 36 States have in mind when they ratified the seventeenth amendment? What they had in mind is of some consequence. It sheds some light upon what construction we should put on the amendment in this case.

If I were to refer to the popular understanding in States where I have some acquaintance with it, I should be entirely justified in saying that the people who ratified this amendment, through the agency of the several members of the legislatures of the States they represented in their several districts, supposed this was an amendment to permit the election of Senators by direct vote of the people in those States. They did not think it meant that in the event of vacancies occurring nearly or quite five years from the 4th day of March, 1914, by reason of death, resignation, or removal, Senators for a term of five years should be subject to the provisions of the original Constitution if they became candidates to fill the vacancies.

That is what this proposed precedent does. It does not simply admit Mr. Glass, but it is a virtual declaration that in these potential vacancies, some 32 of them, running for nearly six-year periods, five years from the 4th of next March, the precedent thus made ought to be adhered to. We can not vote to admit Mr. Glass and then at some future time, say, the 1st day of April next, vote to establish some other precedent in the case of some other applicant.

Suppose a Senator from some State like Rhode Island or North Dakota resigns or dies and the governor of that State does as the governor of Alabama has done. If the governor of that State be a Republican instead of a Democrat, it makes no difference.

The reason of the rule still persists. Therefore, in the States supposed, if the governor, having no express affirmative act of the legislature to direct or to limit his power, under some implied authority of a former statute of the State, neglecting to call a session of the legislature to legislate on filling the vacancy, exercises the power himself, the same question is presented. The precedent is made. We can not well, in the light of reason, or paying attention to the force of public opinion, if that be of any consequence whatever, or to the sense of consistency, if that amounts to anything at all, vote to change this precedent once made. Therefore it becomes a guiding decision, not only in this case but in 32 other cases, in some of which it may run from to-day more than five years in the event of a vacancy; in others it may run four years; in others it may run practically a year and a half or two years.

So this precedent, once made, becomes a construction of the seventeenth amendment, and that construction is in flat derogation of the understanding of the seventeenth amendment when ratified by the 36 States, as I understand it.

I think this is of some importance, not necessarily as guiding the vote of a Senator but in reasoning out the purpose of the seventeenth amendment.

I have an idea that the seventeenth amendment, as construed by this precedent, was never intended to prolong the original Constitution as to the election of United States Senators. I have an idea that it was intended to be remedial; that it was intended to be a complete and a sufficient instrument for the change. Here is something that I know is a rule of government, and I know it is a rule of political action too: Public statutes or constitutional amendments made for the purpose of removing a mischief, remedial in their character, are in every instance to be given a liberal construction. For what purpose? To advance the remedy and to remove the old evil.

If that be so, the seventeenth amendment ought to be construed in such a way as to advance the popular election of Senators. It ought to be construed so that the election of Senators, whether for the full terms of six years, or for vacancies made in terms a part of which have already been served by some Senator, shall be filled by popular election rather than by the method of the original Constitution.

If, in the public opinion, the method of selecting Senators by State legislatures had failed and a remedy was provided by a popular election, a construction ought to be given in the Senate that would advance this remedy rather than one that would retard it. Looking at the amendment in question, which amends section 3 of Article I of the original Constitution, to me it seems apparent that one thing was intended, and it specifically declares that thing. It says that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, and that when vacancies shall happen in the office of Senator the governor of the State in which the vacancy occurs shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

That is all, if we stop there; but what is that, up to that A complete change in the method of election; a mandatory direction that Senators shall be elected by the people instead of by the legislatures of the several States. Thus far it makes no provision for a vacancy save to fill it by an election to be called by the governor. The following clause of that section provides for the temporary filling of vacancies. when vacancies shall occur the executive of the State shall issue writs of election. There is not anything doubtful about that. It is an explicit direction. It is a constitutional mandate to the governors of all the States. If the seventeenth amendment ended here, every vacancy could be filled only by an election pursuant to the writ issued by the governor. The interval between the event creating the vacancy and filling it by such election would leave the State without a Senator. To obviate this the governor may have the power conferred upon him by the State legislature to make a temporary appointment until the vacancy can be filled by an election at such time as the legislature may direct. The length of the governor's temporary appointment is determined by the legislature.

The seventeenth amendment being remedial in character, I think it ought to be liberally construed to advance the purposes intended by the amendment. It ought not to be construed in such a way as to postpone the application of that amendment to the election of Senators by a direct vote.

It seems to me that when the seventeenth amendment was adopted section 3 of Article I ceased to exist. Without raising any question as to the time, we would all agree that it was on the 31st of May, 1913, at least that it became operative. It is possible that it was operative prior to that time, upon the instant that the legislature of the thirty-sixth State adopted it; but, at any rate, it was effective on and after the 31st of May, 1913. On and after that time the old provision of the original Constitution for the election of Senators ceased to exist. Thereafter and now there is but one provision in the Constitution for the election of Senators. No part of the original Constitution on that subject survived. That provision has been quoted here a great deal. I quote so much of it as relates to the filling of vacancies by the executive authority of the State. He is required to issue writs of election to fill such vacancies upon the happening thereof.

It stops with the power in the executive for a single thing. He has no discretion at that point. He must issue a writ of

There is a proviso attached to this clause. A proviso in no instance limits or impairs the body of the section in which it is found unless on the express subject contained in the proviso. The express power contained in the proviso here limits the mandatory order of this clause of the amendment only so far as enumerated. It limits it in a single thing and in none other. It provides:

That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

The only thing this does with the mandatory power in the body of the second clause of the amendment is to provide that the legislature of the State may suspend the mandatory direction to the governor in the body of the clause. That orders the executive to issue an immediate writ for an election. It provides that the legislature has that discretionary power to fix the time of an election, and pending that a governor may appoint to fill the vacancy if the legislature confers that power upon him. It provides that the legislature of a State may fix the time when an election shall be held by the people to fill a vacancy, and the time the governor may appoint is measured by the time when they authorize him to make the appointment and the time when they require an election to be held to fill that vacancy. That period between those two intervals of time constitutes the sole power of an executive to make a temporary appointment.

This is the only limitation upon the mandatory power of this clause. A governor of a State has but one power, and that is limited to the issuing of the writs of election. If he attempts to do anything beyond that without coming within the scope of this provisó, he has no authority.

In the Maryland case the governor of that State kept within his constitutional power. I wish to observe here that the governor of Maryland in the writ that he issued purported to act and did act by virtue of the authority vested not by a State statute but by the Constitution as amended by the seventeenth amendment. Here is his language:

Therefore, I, Phillips Lee Goldsborough, governor of the State of Maryland, acting by and under the authority and direction contained in the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, hereby issue, publish, and declare this my writ of election for a special election to be held throughout the State of Maryland on Tuesday, the 4th day of November, 1913.

And so forth.

The governor of Maryland, either on his own understanding or acting upon competent advice, read in the seventeenth amendment a mandatory direction to him, a plenary authority day they could by their choice select a Senator. They did so. day they could by their choice select a Senator. They did so. The same constitutional mandate that Gov. Goldsborough, of the State of Maryland, had Gov. O'Neal, of the State of Alabama, had. He had the same constitutional power. But he saw fit in the exercise of a political discretion, not a constitu-tional power, to do something else. The exigencies of politics are asked here to furnish the basis of a permanent precedent in the Senate that will go to governors of 48 States, that the mandatory provision of the Constitution in the seventeenth amendment does not apply when it says, "When vacancies happen, the executive of the State shall issue writs of election," unless a governor wills it.

The full term or a vacancy is to be filled but one way, and that is by a popular election, unless a State statute confers on a governor power to make a temporary appointment to fill a vacancy. No question arises except on vacancies. No question raises even on the vacancy if the body of the second clause of this amendment be considered, where it provides that writs shall be issued by the executive of the State. It is only upon the proviso on which the contention arises for a different construction. In the proviso it is said that the governor of the State may appoint, if he is given power by an act of the legislature, until such time as the legislature shall direct an election.

This is not a power contained in the Constitution that of itself vests in the governor the right to appoint. It is a power that is delegated to the legislature of a State. If they do not see fit to exercise the power, there remains under the body of this clause only the mandatory direction to the governor to issue writs of election. It depends on the State legislature whether this suspensory power to fill vacancies by the governor shall be exercised or not.

What is the governor's power under the present Constitution The old power of a governor to appoint during a recess of the legislature was solely a constitutional power. Under the original Constitution the governor always appointed by virtue of constitutional authority. Under the seventeenth amendment, if a governor appoints at all, it is by virtue of a statutory authority. It comes from the legislature of the State to the governor in every instance. It does not exist in the seventeenth amendment. It must flow from an enabling act of the legislature conferring it on the governor. It might be that the governor's power to appoint is a constitutional one, but it is dormant until aroused by the legislature.

That brings me to another question that I think is of some consequence in illuminating what the seventeenth amendment means. Being remedial in character and to be liberally construed, it being, too, a complete substitute for the original Constitution as written on this subject, it seems to me when that complete substitute is adopted the old method of election is dead, and no Senator shall hold except under the seventeenth amendment; there is but one thing to do in applying its provisions—to construe it so as to require an election of Senators by the people. That was the spirit of the amendment when it was adopted, whatever may have been the spirit when it was written.

This constitutional power is limited only by the act of the legislature. Therefore, in construing what it means, an old statute of a State, I do not think, possesses any efficiency in vesting in the governor appointing power. If the act of 1875 of the State of Alabama required the governor to call an election to fill vacancies, it is said it was repealed by the act of 1909. The act of 1909, it is claimed, vested in the governor power to appoint certain officers. This could not include United States Senators. The legislature could not be reasonably presumed to have had it in contemplation when they passed the act of 1909, if the act of 1909 be relied upon as an authority here, because the Legislature of Alabama had no intention of covering the appointment of United States Senators at that time, because that was provided for by the original Constitution as then in force.

If that be true, then when the seventeenth amendment was adopted only such powers could be implied and only such statutory construction could be made of existing statutes or those enacted prior to the 31st day of May, 1913, as will be in aid of and execute the purposes of this amendment, and not to hinder, delay, obstruct, or entirely prevent the execution of the remedy designed.

Therefore all the old statutes enforced prior to the 31st day of May, 1913, in any of the 48 States of the Union are wholly powerless to impede or prevent the application of the remedy contained in this seventeenth amendment. If, however, on the other hand, there be statutes that can be invoked to execute the purposes of the seventeenth amendment, they can properly be used because they advance the remedy instead of hindering it.

I think that is not only a sound rule of law, but it is consonant enough with common sense to appeal to the average man, because I know of no rule of law that is not based upon common sense. I know of no rule that distinguishes between common sense and law outside of the technical art of pleading, and that has nothing to do with the abstract justice of any cause submitted for decision.

Let me restate this case, because it is going to the people of 48 States. I do not so much care what the Senate of the United States thinks about it. I am not talking exclusively to the Senators; I am talking to the people who adopted this amendment. Vote as you please; that is what I am going to do, on an enduring precedent, even if I must vote against a Republican, as I did the other day on a great remedial amendment designed to remove evils that were nation-wide. Scandal followed upon scandal, deadlocked legislature after deadlocked ones, unrepresented States here in this Chamber stretching into weeks, months, and years, investigations that followed from the capitals of many States until they culminated here in the Senate in nation-wide controversies, had occurred. One State was mentioned here—Delaware—by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Sutherland] that was represented by two vacancies for nearly a year. Whose fault was it? Was it the duty of the paternal United States Government to interfere and compel Delaware to send two Senators? The State that I temporarily represent for some 23 months only on my present tenure was represented in this body for 22 days by two vacant seats. Nobody in that State had the hardihood to say that the United States Government was interfering with the sovereign powers of a State. I have a very great respect for the power of the State. The greater part of my active public life has been devoted, so far as I have been able, to the administration, may I hope beneficially, of the sovereign powers of a State.

hope beneficially, of the sovereign powers of a State.

After all these evils, after many years of effort, an amendment was adopted. Whether it will prove an efficient remedy only time will tell. I have not been as sanguine as some who have supported the measure, although I supported it earnestly for some 10 years before it became a part of the Constitution. I have been disposed to think it will improve the State legislatures as much as, possibly more than, this Senate. But whether it will produce the beneficial results hoped for or not, it is here. Any statute that any one of the 48 States had enough the time it became the constitutional law governing us governing. time it became the constitutional law governing us, governing the electors in the choice of their two Senators, can be used to advance it. That is natural. That is in the order of things. That is following the established rules of construction. It is applying Government operations as they have been applied in many years past. We can use those statutes to facilitate the execution of the seventeenth amendment. No existing statute on the 31st day of May, 1913, can be used to destroy, to obstruct, to delay the remedy that is intended in the seventeenth amend-If anything is to be done to make the proviso in the second clause of the amendment operative, it must be by affirmative subsequent legislation. After the 31st day of May if any one or more of the several legislatures enacted affirmative legis lation vesting in the governor of the State the power to appoint until the people of the State might elect to fill the remainder of the vacancy in such manner as the legislature should direct, that act passed after the 31st day of May, 1913, would be valid and it would be strictly within the scope of the seventeenth amend-

Where does the power come from to make valid or to breathe any life into a statute that existed on the 31st of May, 1913? Nowhere. That only provided what the States might do thereafter. It does not say in accordance with any existing legislation, but it requires evidently affirmative action by the legislatures after the 31st day of May, 1913, in order to avail the State of the power to suspend for a time the provisions that are mandatory in the body of the section; and if the State does not do it, whose fault is it? Nobody can compel a State to elect Federal officers. Suppose a State were to voluntarily decline to elect from its several districts a solitary Member of the House of Representatives, suppose they abstain from electing any Senators, could the State complain? Could it properly come with petition or by other agencies to the seat of power and say that the Federal Government had deprived it of its rights?

You can not compel a State to represent itself; you can only give it the permissive power, and thereafter it depends upon the quickening force of public spirit in that State whether they have representatives or not either in the other House or in the Senate. It is therefore a question for the State to decide. If it does not decide, that is its own fault. So it seems to me that the position that a State is denied its representation here, and that that is in contravention of the provision of the Constitution that no State shall, without its consent, be deprived of its representation here, is not well taken. It is not that a State shall be deprived of representation by its own default; it is that this provision of the Constitution governing amendments is itself unamendable, so that any State may be deprived of equal representation without its consent; in other words, that portion of the Constitution on amendments is not unamendable; a proper amendment can be submitted and ratified by the requisite number of States by which there shall be only 48 Senators in this body, and it would be binding on the other 12 States as well as on the 36 States which ratified the amendment. That would keep the representation equal. If they made the number 5 Senators from each State and increased the total membership to 240, it would be equally binding, because the provision says the State shall not be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. It does not say how many Senators there shall be from each State. We began with two; we have adhered to that number, but there is nothing compelling us forever to keep to that as a sacred number.

The only unamendable provision is that the equal suffrage of the State in the Senate is not to be denied. That, however, is for the benefit of the State; it is permissive. It may enable the State to send here its representatives, but it was never intended that a State should take advantage of its own sluggishness, of its own misconstruction of or opposition to the law, or of its own inability to send its representatives here.

ness, of its own misconstruction of or opposition to the law, or of its own inability to send its representatives here.

There is an entirely good reason why the governor of Alabama does not issue a writ of election. I will be plain about it and say it is not, in my judgment, violating the rules of the Senate when I state what I think is the reason. It is purely political. The governor of Alabama desires to keep in his executive hands the naming of a Senator from Alabama. Our esteemed colleague, the late Senator Johnston of Alabama, whom we all loved, died last May, as I remember. In the intervening time many months have elapsed; in that time the governor of Maryland has issued a writ and there has been held an election; in that time the governor of Alabama could equally, if he had been so inclined, have issued a writ under the mandatory provision of the Constitution, and there could have been held an election in the State of Alabama. A Senator could have been elected; such Senator could have been knocking at our doors here qualified with credentials, not from a governor, not from one who is attempting to usurp power which belongs to the executive of no State, but with credentials in the name of the qualified voters of the State of Alabama. Then this case would be on a parity with the claims of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Lee], who was admitted on such credentials.

It is strange to me why Senators here who were so solicitous in arguments about the rights of the people of Maryland not many days ago, 200,000 men having gone to the polls in Maryland and voted, one candidate having received a decided majority, by virtue of that came here and asked admission, now take a different view. I was in entire sympathy with the gentleman asking admission. He is not of my party; but I was unable to escape the inevitable conclusion that the constitutional duty imposed upon the governor of Maryland was properly discharged and that he had nothing to do under that provision of the seventeenth amendment except to issue a writ of election. He had performed his constitutional duty, an election had been held, and the electors of Maryland had sent their Senator

I saw no escape from the logic of the situation, save to vote for the admission of Senator Lee.

To-day there is another situation presented. Those who were so clamorous for the rights of the people, those who a few short days ago were beating high heaven about popular rights, are to-day talking about the rights of the governor of Alabama, about the rights of a sovereign State, about denying representation to a sovereign State, which, either through the inactivity of those in authority or by the usurpation of the governor, who is more than the entire voting body of Alabama, declines to act. We have heard about everybody but the people of Alabama. The governor undertakes now to thwart the intent of the seventeenth amendment and the will of the voter by one fell act of appointment. I am unable to understandand I have no shade of partisan politics in this—why there was such a lusty zeal for the Senator from Maryland, who came here backed with 200,000 votes cast, and why the same reasoning does not apply in the State of Alabama. A great many who were in principle opposed to the direct election of Senators see presented in this opportunity a chance of delaying the application of that undesirable constitutional amendment for some five years. From that, if this precedent is made, there is no appeal save to those who are the constituents of those Senators.

I do not know the fact, but my recollection is that the State of Alabama never ratified the amendment. I shall bear correction with great equanimity if I am wrong; but I think that that State never did ratify the constitutional amendment. Senators to whom I have referred are entirely consistent; but a consistent man is not always right, though he may be consistent in his error. They were opposed to the amendment, and they are now opposed to the election by the people of the State of Alabama of a Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. For the information of the Senator from Illinois, I will say that the Alabama Legislature has not been in session since the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution was ratified.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, may I inquire?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Because the legislature meets every four years

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

BANKHEAD. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois, while I am on my feet, if the Illinois Legislature has ever passed a statute under which Illinois can hold an election in accordance with the provisions of the amendment? Has the Senator's State provided for that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. Mr. BANKHEAD. When? Mr. SHERMAN. Such an act was passed on the 25th day of June, 1913.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was a regular session of the legisla-

Mr. SHERMAN. It was a regular session of the legislature. I will tell the Senator another thing that might be material along that line. In March, 1912, there were two very distinguished candidates for President in this country. They did not agree. One wanted to adhere to the old way of selecting delegates, the other wanted a direct election by the voters. They came out to our State and asked for a presidential preferential primary. The governor of our State, while it cost a little money, called the legislature in special session, and such a law enacted. Its application cost in the neighborhood of $130,000, but it was worth the money for the candidate who won; the other candidate likely did not think it was. have regarded it as a horrible waste of public funds.

Let me read something from the constitution of Alabama. constitution provides for quadrennial sessions of the legislature, and that constitution was made by the people of Alabama, who, in making their organic act, regulated it to suit themselves. So every four years there is a 60-day session of the legislature.

Sometimes in the excessive zeal for reform the reformer goes to the opposite pole. Long sessions of legislatures have become sometimes a menace in many States, especially the larger States or the States containing the larger cities, where questions of "great pith and moment" come up, in which there is a radical difference of opinion, so that sessions have been long drawn out in many States. I know of sessions that have continued for nearly six months in my own State, and in other States they are continued, where no limitation has been placed upon them; but in Alabama not only are there quadrennial sessions of the legislature—that is some protection in itself; the people ought to be able to recover their breath in four years and become entirely sane, after being outraged and ravaged by a legislature— but in order to "make assurance doubly sure," the constitution of Alabama provides that the legislature shall be in regular session not to exceed 60 days. Still, in that State they want to select Senators by the legislature; they are opposed to the present order of things under the seventeenth amendment of the Constitution. A 60-day session suffices to elect a United States Senator, to say nothing of passing supply bills for the State and taking care of general legislation. So out of the fear of one evil they have flown to the opposite extreme—quadrennial sessions to last but 60 days. Why, in some of our States, as in New York, in Illinois, in Pennsylvania, a man could hardly get to the pay roll in 60 days. [Laughter.]

Special sessions or extraordinary sessions are not such public calamities as many people think. Some good has come out of them. Section 122 of article 5 of the constitution of Alabama

The governor may, by proclamation, on extraordinary occasions, convene the legislature at the seat of government, or at a different place, if, since their last adjournment, causes shall appear; and he shall state specifically in such proclamation each matter concerning which the action of that body is deemed necessary.

What is the matter with the governor? Has he no power? Has paralysis suddenly fallen upon him? Have the ' the mighty" smitten him with some strange misunderstanding? Why does he not issue a proclamation? What kinds of causes? Trivial ones, that are frivolous and of no moment? No. Whenever he thinks the causes are such as to be "deemed necessary." Is the election of a United States Senator in Alabama necessary? You say it is. Then, why do you not elect him? governor has the power to call your legislature in extraordinary session to provide for it. Why does he not do it? Have the members of the legislature all resigned? Are they dead? Are they fugitives from justice? Are they disabled? Are they unable to agree? Could they not legislate to elect a Senator if convened, and, if they could not, where is the power to come from?

Suppose there is a deadlocked legislature; suppose they could not legislate. That has happened every once in a while. I have known legislatures to fail repeatedly in the enactment of legislation because they could not agree, and they have been hung up for many days, and adjournments have come and no action had. The governor could call an election under his constitutional power.

It must be that the governor of Alabama does not deem it necessary to call a special session of the legislature. If he called a special session of the legislature, it could, by an enabling act, vest in him under the proviso in the second clause of the seventeenth amendment the power to appoint. At the same time the legislature could provide that the governor could issue a writ for a special election to fill the vacancy, if he believes he has no such constitutional power

That leads me to consider this point: What can a legislature do after they have convened? Suppose the governor of Alabama should convene it in extraordinary session under his constitutional prerogative—and it is a high prerogative to do so—what could it do? It is within the discretion of the Legislature of Alabama to vest in the governor the power to appoint—for how long? Until an election by the people in such manner as the legislature may direct. That does not, as argued, of itself make a mandatory provision requiring some direction of the legislature; but I think that refers entirely not to the way in which the election shall be held. Most States now have ample election machinery for this purpose. All they need to do is to make it applicable to a United States Senator by a single amendment to an existing statute. The time of election, when it shall be held, and for how long the governor shall fill the temporary vacancy pending such election is statutory.

That authority to issue election writs is necessarily under the seventeenth amendment a constitutional authority. It may be suspended in part, and it is by the proviso; but when it is so suspended it must, by an affirmative subsequent legislative act, vest in the governor the power to make a temporary appointment until an election shall be called, and the governor issues a writ for that election at the time provided in the act. That is what it means; that is what it says.

Legislative construction has something to do with it and is worth something. The legislatures, I think, of two States have already given an interpretation to this constitutional amendment. The Legislature of Illinois has enacted the following provision, approved in June, 1913, as an amendment of section 130 of the general election laws by adding:

130a. When a vacancy shall occur in the office of United States Senator from this State, the governor shall make temporary appointment to fill such vacancy until the next election of Representatives in Congress, at which time such vacancy shall be filled by election, and the Senator so elected shall take office as soon thereafter as he shall receive his certificate of election.

There is one other State in the Union-I thought I had a memorandum of it, but I have not; I saw a brief dispatch which I cut out and made no further note of it—which has enacted a like statute since the 31st of May, 1913.

The provision enacted by the Illinois Legislature is an enabling act passed subsequent to May 31, 1913, and is in execution of the proviso of the second clause of the seventeenth Further, it is to promote and advance the popular remedy of the direct election of Senators. Any statute that has been in force in Illinois or any other State that would be promotive of the remedy would be applicable. That is a reasonable conclusion, it seems to me, because when power is granted in any remedial statute or in any remedial amendment of an organic act all of the incidental means necessary to execute that power are implied in the granting of the power. There is nothing to be implied, however, imported into, or annexed to the provision or the language in which the power is conferred to obstruct, hinder, or destroy the remedy. All of the arguments here proceed on the idea that some construction shall be put upon the constitutional amendment which will delay its opera-tion for a potential five-year period as to 32 Senators.

The statute of Alabama, sought to be invoked here in order to give validity to the governor's appointment, is a preexisting statute, not one that has been enacted subsequent to the promulgation of the seventeenth amendment.

I know it does not do any good to do so, and I never read decisions in a political case; I quit that 20 years ago; I do read sometimes from texts, because in the settlement of original cases like this it is only by the exercise of such reasoning faculties as we possess that we are able to solve questions presented for the first time. I read from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations:

Narrow and technical reasoning is misplaced when it is brought to bear upon an instrument framed by the people themselves, for themselves, and designed as a chart upon which every man, learned and unlearned, may be able to trace the leading principles of government.

What did the men, learned and unlearned, understand this amendment to mean? Whether or not lawyers agree we need not stop to discuss, for lawyers seldom agree if there are two or more of them; but what did the average man understand the seventeenth amendment to mean? He understood it to mean that after proclamation by the Secretary of State on the 31st of May, 1913, that it had been ratified by the requisite number of States, all Senators of the United States were to be elected by the direct vote of the people of the several States.

Reading further from Cooley:

A reasonable construction is what such an instrument demands and should receive; and the real question is what the people meant and not how meaningless their words can be made by the application of arbitrary rules * *

Where a constitution is revised or amended, (a) the new provisions come into operation at the same moment that those they take the place of cease to be in force.

In another place, referring to the interpretation of constitutions, the same authority continues:

We are not to import difficulties into a constitution by a consideration of extrinsic facts when none appear upon its face. If, however, a difficulty really exists, which an examination of every part of the instrument does not enable us to remove, there are certain extrinsic aids which may be resorted to and which are more or less satisfactory in the light they afford. Among these aids is a contemplation of the object to be accomplished or the mischief designed to be remedied or guarded against by the clause in which the ambiguity is met with. When we once know the reason which alone determined the will of the lawmakers we ought to interpret and apply the words used in a manner suitable and consonant to that reason and as will be best calculated to effectuate the intent.

The adverse construction of the seventeenth amendment projects the old method of electing Senators potentially five years into the future as to every Senator who held a seat here on the 31st of May, 1913, beginning March 4, 1913. It really makes the seventeenth amendment retrospective in its avowed purpose, and postpones the remedy instead of advancing it.

I wish to add here-I am hurrying along as much as I can, for I have occupied more time than I wished—that nobody has a vested right to an office. I have heard with astonishment for the first time in the Senate—and I have practiced in the courts for 30 years of my life—that a public officer has a vested right in a public office such as a man has in a quarter section of land out West; that you can not take an office away from him without trying the case and condemning the office for a public purpose, as it were, and paying its value under the eminent-domain process, applied in some mysterious way.

There is no such thing as a vested right in a public office. At any time, either by constitutional or statutory law, according to the source of that office, whether it be constitutionally or statutorily created—that is the test—the same authority that created the office can destroy it without any regard to the man holding that office. The only limitation in this instance is that if we destroy one of the Senators from one State we would have to destroy a Senator from every one of the 48 States of the Union, so as to keep equal the suffrage of the States in the Senate; but, there being no vested right in an office, how does the human being—I am not going to say now anything about a person—how does the human being occupy six years of a senatorial term? If he starts in with an even six years, he occupies the office by virtue of the Constitution for six years, if he does not resign or is not removed or is not translated to another sphere of action. If none of those contingencies happen he holds it for six years. What is a "term"? It is a time. What is "time"? A measured portion of duration. There is nothing under the heavens that could change that six-year term but a constitutional amendment altering it. No construction we could put upon it would change it. The six-year term can not be affected, as was cogently argued by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Sutherland]. That has occurred to me many times in my reflections on this subject. The six-year term can not be changed; you can not shorten it; you can not lengthen it; but as to the Senator who occupies that six-year place, holding a delegated power during that time, something may happen, some one of the contingencies to which I have referred may remove him, and then there is a vacancy. We call it a vacancy in the office; but in reality the term is there. You can not destroy it. Time is only a poor invention of mortals to describe something we do not understand. Nobody knows what it is. The nearest we can come to it is saying it is a measured portion of the enduring things or phenomena that we see around us. If the earth would quit revolving, we would have to get a new method of computing time. That is the only thing we are able to measure time by now.

As to this period of six years, when a man dies or one of the other contingencies happens and he ceases to hold his office there is a vacancy; nobody is in there; there is an official vacancy in that period. Consequently the human being who holds that office for the time being can be affected, but the term can not be affected. It never was supposed by the citizens who voted to ratify the seventeenth amendment or by the lawyers or Senators who framed it that we were affecting the six-year artificial thing which we call a "term." Whether it is 6 years or 6,000 years is immaterial; it is a fixed portion of duration and we measure it in that way. Nobody ever thought that could be affected by any language used in the seventeenth What they did think was that, there being no amendment. vested right in an office, possibly the seventeenth amendment when ratified and proclamation made would deprive sitting Senators of their seats. There is not a lawyer who does not know what I am about to state, assuming now that lawyers have a small measure of common sense—laymen sometimes think they have not, and I am not going to quarrel with thembut assuming that they have some small measure of it, what did they intend, with the knowledge that every practical lawyer has?

There is hardly a justice of the peace in the country who does not know that an office may be destroyed at any time by the authority that makes it. In order to defend against that destruction of the office, or interference with its being held by the person then in it, necessitating another election and the expense incident to the State authorities calling an election to fill vacancies that might be thereby created, out of caution they added that provision that the election or term of any sitting Senator should not be affected, lengthened, shortened, or destroyed.

If this is the right view, I am unable to see why, first, the governor of Alabama can not convene his legislature in special session. If the legislature is convened in special session, it can do one of two things or both. It can authorize the governor to appoint until the election in November, 1914, for instance. That would be a convenient interval, and there would be no ex-That would be subsequent legislation. It would be in pense. aid of and to enforce this amendment rather than to take the old statute in existence prior to the 31st of May, 1913, in hindrance of it. Or it could require an immediate election.

Because of the final effect of the precedent to be made I have taken this half hour in order to set out at some length in the RECORD the reasons that prompt me to vote against the admission of Mr. Glass. I believe that in the promotion of this remedy the only view we can take is that it is indispensable in the execution of the amendment that the governor of the State, if he wishes the power to appoint, shall convene the legislature in special session, so that it may give him the power and may, if necessary, fix the time when the election shall be held. the absence of that the man knocks at the door here bearing purported credentials without any constitutional title to the

During the delivery of Mr. Sherman's speech, The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will kindly suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which the Secretary will now state.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily laid aside pending the consideration of the election case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? There being no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I gave notice several days ago that at the close of the morning hour to-day I would address the Senate upon a resolution which is on the table. I do not desire to interfere with this matter, which is, of course, as we all understand, a question of the highest privilege, but I was of the opinion possibly that if the request was made we might vote upon this election case at 3 o'clock; and if so, I could complete my remarks after 3 o'clock.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any other order of business that the Senate prefers to take up, I will not interfere with it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I do not desire to make any extended remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I simply wanted to submit a suggestion to the Senate that will not disturb the Senator at all.

Mr. President, I am not going to ask unanimous consent, because I understand that would necessitate the calling of the roll and it would consume time, but I ask if we can not agree that we will vote on the pending resolution to-day at 3 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not later than 3.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not later than 3.
Mr. SHERMAN. I object.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. What would be the status of such an agreement?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It would be simply a gentlemen's agreement that the Senate shall vote at 3 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The rule provides for unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not asking for unanimous consent. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know what such an agreement would be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It simply amounts to a request by the Senator from Alabama that Senators complete their speeches and get through by 3 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I supposed there might be some ulterior and latent construction put upon it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I assure the Senator that I had not for a moment any such purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There may be very meritorious ulterior purposes, and I thought it might be of that character.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My only desire is to hasten the conclusion of the pending resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection whatever, and I would not object to unanimous consent being granted if requested, but the agreement the Senator proposes is something that has no parliamentary status whatever. It would bind no one except Senators here, whereas a unanimous-consent agreement would bind everyone.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. Mr. BORAH. Would not the Senator from Alabama prefer unanimous-consent agreement that we shall vote at 3 o'clock? Mr. BANKHEAD. I would; but under the rule, if I asked for a unanimous-consent agreement, we must have a roll call in order to secure a quorum.

Mr. KERN. I think the rule requires the roll to be called only in the case of a unanimous-consent agreement as to a joint resolution or bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Alabama kindly let me suggest that the Senator from Illinois informs me he would object to a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 3 o'clock. I simply make this statement that we may avoid the necessity of having the roll called to develop a quorum to con-It is known in advance that it will not be agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was the reason why I did not suggest a unanimous-consent agreement. I thought we might have what is sometimes called a gentlemen's agreement and all would be willing to abide by it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The trouble is it would not bind any Senators who are not here, and they are in a majority.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand it would not bind any except those present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor if he wishes to proceed. If not, the Chair will recognize some other Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senater from Illinois yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For just one word.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only want to say that I hope the Senator from Idaho will not understand that those of us who are interested in the agricultural-extension bill will be willing to lay it aside when the contested-election case is over, the morning hour having expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Idaho prefers to proceed, I will be very glad to yield, that he may speak in pursuance to the notice that he has given,

Mr. BORAH. I would not take the Senator from Illinois off the floor. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall conclude.

Mr. SHERMAN. That probably would leave this matter pending for further discussion. What I want to have understood is that, so far as I have any right to the floor, without losing my right for a subsequent discussion of this question, I would be glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to have the Senator yield. I prefer that he should conclude his remarks, and I then will see if I can get the floor.

After the conclusion of Mr. Sherman's speech,

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I suggested a few moments ago, I gave notice of my intention to speak to-day. however, great anxiety to dispose of this matter, and it should be disposed of, it being a matter of the highest privilege. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is also very anxious to conclude the consideration of the agricultural extension bill, because he desires to leave the city. Under those circumstances I withdraw the notice, and shall not undertake to occupy the floor to-day

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I, for one, can see no conflict between this case and the Maryland case, provided authority is found for the appointment.

After all that has been said about election by the peopleand there is no man who has championed that cause longer than I have, unless he is older-any provision for the election of United States Senators by the people necessarily would have to make some provision for temporary vacancies to be filled by appointments by the governor.

I, for one, am very clear that if a State statute contained the requisite authority prior to the enactment of the seventeenth amendment, it would be sufficient, just as in the State of Alabama, under its statute which authorizes the governor to fill any vacancy in a State office by appointment, after the enactment of that law the legislature constitutionally authorized to do so might have created some office that was not known when the authority to make the appointment was enacted into law, and that authority, of course, would apply to the office thus created.

I am also very certain, and I do not think anyone has really planted himself upon firm ground to the contrary, that the office of United States Senator is a State office, as distinguished from a Federal or United States office. But, Mr. President, while I was of the opinion that Mr. Glass should be seated, and while I even authorized the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley] to sign my name to his report, I am satisfied now that a fair interpretation of the proviso in the second paragraph of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution applies only to the temporary vacancy that exists where a law has been already enacted for the election of Senators under the amendment.

I do not think any man should stand upon the pride of his opinion. While it is very pleasant to insist upon the correctness of one's position, I think it goes without saying that when he is thoroughly convinced that that position is erroneous it is his duty so to state. The proviso reads:

Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

While the language relating to the election as directed by the legislature follows the authority to empower the executive to make the appointment, I am fully satisfied, upon a careful study of this provision, that the power to authorize the executive to make the appointment is dependent upon the existence of a legal situation where an election has been already provided for in some form.

Under the statutes of Alabama no provision exists at this time for the election of a United States Senator. In my own State there is such a provision. If such a provision existed in Alabama, although the authority to make the appointment antedated the transfer of the election from the legislature to the people, I should be very clearly of the opinion that it had application to the case of a United States Senator.

In construing this constitutional provision and this proviso, while the suggestion would not apply to Alabama, because I think Alabama is overwhelmingly in favor of the election of United States Senators by the people, yet the Congress has no power or means by which to enforce the amendment by affirmative legislation. Therefore there is a sufficient reason that the authorization under the seventeenth amendment for the appointment by the governor be conditioned upon the action of the legislature, and, where the action of the governor is essential in calling a special session, the action of the governor previously making provision for the election of a United States Senator. Otherwise, I can readily see how to quite an extent the purpose of the amendment might be defeated.

Having reached this conclusion, being satisfied that it is the correct one, and believing that a man ought not to hesitate because of any pride of opinion, when the vote is taken on the right of Mr. GLASS to a seat in the Senate I shall vote in the negative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question recurs on the adoption, as a substitute, of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I very much regret that after a very careful examination of the law I am not able to vote to seat Mr. Glass. His high character and ability would make it a pleasure to vote to seat him; but, in my judgment, if he should be seated, it would be in violation of the seventeenth amendment.

I do not think the seventeenth amendment can be misunderstood. It is easier to understand it than to misunderstand it. At the time it was discussed on the floor of the Senate I dare say every Senator was of the opinion that after it was ratified by three-fourths of the States every Senator who thereafter obtained a seat in this Chamber would be here under the provisions of the seventeenth amendment.

At the time this amendment was being discussed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow] he made, in part, this explanation on May 23, 1911:

The Constitution as it now reads, referring to vacancies in the

The Constitution as it now reads, referring to vacancies in the Senate, says:

"And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

Instead of that, I provide the following:

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies."

Which is exactly the language used in providing for the filling of vacancies which occur in the House of Representatives, with the exception that the word "of" is used in the first line for the word "from," which, however, makes no material difference.

Then my substitute provides that—

"The legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct."

That is practically the same provision which now exists in the case of such a vacancy. The governor of the State may appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy until the election occurs, and he is directed by this amendment to "issue writs of election to fill such vacancies."

That is, I use exactly the same language in directing the governor to call special elections for the election of Senators to fill vacancies that is used in the Constitution in directing him to issue writs of election to fill vacancies in the House of Representatives.

So far as my knowledge goes, the construction which the

So far as my knowledge goes, the construction which the Senator from Kansas placed upon the language of this amendment as submitted by him was not challenged by any Senator on the floor of this Chamber. The language which was used by the Senator from Kansas was practically the same, and I believe the very same, as the language used in a similar joint resolution submitted by Mr. Tucker in 1892. On page 5 of the report which was submitted by Mr. Tucker to the House, this statement was made:

That the title of no Senator may be affected who, at the time of the adoption of the amendment, holds his seat at the hands of the legislature of his State as now provided by the Constitution, the last provision is inserted out of abundant caution.

In other words, the purpose of this amendment as framed by Mr. Tucker, and as later adopted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow], was to protect the title of every sitting Member.

There was a reason for that. It could not have been the purpose of the Senate nor of the House nor of the general assemblies of the several States to interfere in any way with the title of any sitting Member of this body. It seems to me that is the only construction which can be placed upon the language of the seventeenth amendment. No sound reason can be urged why the old system of election should continue after the new method was adopted.

The first paragraph of the amendment provides:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

That was the general, all-controlling constitutional rule which was ratified by the people. There was no exception to that rule, save and except as it is written in the seventeenth amendment. It was contemplated at that time that vacancies would occur by resignation, by death, and possibly by expulsion from the Senate. Knowing that vacancies could occur, out of abundance of caution the Congress provided in the joint resolution the only occasions when a departure could be made from the rule of election by the people, and that was done in the language of the second paragraph;

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

It is made the duty of the executive so to do. The only possible limitation placed upon the method of filling vacancies is in the proviso:

That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

Not "as the legislature has directed," but "as the legislature may direct."

It was not contemplated at that time that the States generally had adopted any rule whereby the executive could appoint. For what reason? Because the only power the governor had to fill a vacancy was derived from the Federal Constitution itself, and that was the condition when the Legislature of Alabama enacted the statute to which reference has been made.

The Federal Constitution had given to the governor the right under certain contingencies to fill vacancies until such time as the legislature should convene. The Legislature of Alabama must have had that in mind when they made the provision in their own code whereby vacancies in the State offices might be filled by the governor by appointment. There was no reason why they should attempt to cover the same ground that was covered by the Federal Constitution, and if they had had it in mind it would have served them no good purpose, because the legislature then was without any authority whatever to pass any law giving to the governor the power to fill a vacancy.

That being the situation, and I am not going to take the time to discuss that statute, suffice it to say, in my judgment, by every rule of reason, a United States Senator is not a State official, and if he were a State official the language of that statute is not broad enough to give authority to the governor to appoint. It seems to me that appears very clearly by a reference to the statute itself. It reads:

That when any office of the State, of any county or municipality thereof, is vacant from death, resignation, removal from the municipality, county, or State, or because the former incumbent absconds, or because an incumbent has been removed for ineligibility, or when the office is vacant from any other cause, and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office, the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

"The unexpired term of such office." Clearly that does not apply to the appointment of a United States Senator when he can not be appointed by the governor for the unexpired term, but only until the legislature convenes.

But let us examine for a few minutes the language of this third paragraph of the seventeenth amendment. The doubt that seems to be in the minds of some Senators is as to what construction shall be placed upon the words "term of any Senator." The language of the third paragraph is:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

If any Senator had been asked after this amendment was ratified whether it would be constitutional for a Senator to be appointed by a governor of a State without being authorized by an act of the legislature at once he would have said, "No." If any Senator had been asked whether it would have been possible to fill any vacancy in the United States Senate except by the method provided by the seventeenth amendment, he would have said, "No." But now, in order to justify the position taken by those Senators who favor the seating of Mr. Glass, they say that Senators are divided into three classes, one to serve for two years, one for four years, and one for six years, as if the term of office was applicable alone to the term which was originally adopted or to a succession of terms thereafter. In order to give it this interpretation, then, it is necessary that vacancies in Senators of the one class shall be filled under the old Constitution for the period of two years, to fill a vacancy in another class for the period of four years, and to fill a vacancy in the third class the old Constitution shall prevail for a period of six years.

But even that strained construction is not sufficient. They have to go the further length and say that every Senator who sits here by appointment by the State executive or for an unexpired term by the selection of a State legislature has no protection whatever under the seventeenth amendment as adopted. Clearly that is a forced construction to say the least Clearly that is a forced construction, to say the least.

Then I am reminded that in the State of Louisiana, perhaps a year ago, the legislature of that State elected Mr. Broussand to the Senate. His term of office has not yet begun. It will be more than seven years before it expires. If anything were to happen to him, under the construction which is given to this statute by those who favor the seating of Mr. Glass, his successor would have to be named by the old system.

I do not believe that it was ever contemplated by anyone who had anything to do with the passing of the resolution embodying the new amendment or with its ratification that the old Constitution was to be in effect for two years with respect to one class, for four years with respect to another, and for six years with respect to the third. All language must be given its natural effect. This language taken of itself is clearly understood. In my judgment everyone who has looked into the proposition believes that from the time it was ratified Senators were thereafter to be elected by popular choice.

Mr. President, I do not feel that at this late hour I should

Mr. President, I do not feel that at this late hour I should occupy the time of the Senate further. I am thoroughly of the opinion that under the law Mr. Glass can not be seated. The State of Alabama can not complain. It is within her power to have her full representation in the Senate whenever she does it in the right way.

It is said that we ought not to so construe this language as to deprive Alabama of her full representation. We are not so construing. We are simply saying that Alabama, as well as every other State, has the right to full representation when she pursues the course which is laid down by the Federal Constitution.

I marveled somewhat yesterday at a position taken by a certain Senator when he said that in the State of Maryland they gave this amendment one construction and acted accordingly, and we felt bound by it, and that Alabama gave it another construction, and they acted in accordance with their construction, and we ought to be bound by it. By the same parity of reasoning, if there were 48 different constructions given to the seventeenth amendment by the 48 different sovereign States, we ought to be bound by them. In other words, the Senate of the United States is no longer to be the judge of the election and qualification of its Members, but we are to be the judges of the qualifications of its Members, provided, however, that we accept the ipse dixit of the governor of each State, together with the advice of his counselors, and determine this case in accordance with their views and not in accordance with our own convictions. We are sitting here in a judicial capacity, and we ought to determine this case from that standpoint and from that standpoint alone.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, just a word. During the three years this amendment was under consideration, I do not believe it ever occurred to the mind of a Senator on this floor that after its adoption an appointment could be made to the Senate by any governor, unless it were a temporary appointment pending an election. If every Senator had been individually asked for an expression of opinion at that time as to what this language meant, I do not believe there would have been a single Senator who would not have said that vacancies in the Senate would, after the adoption of the amendment, be filled exactly as vacancies in the House are filled, by an election, provided, of course, that in the meantime the legislature of a State had made provision whereby, pending that election, the governor could make an appointment to fill a vacancy, so that every State would have its quota.

There is no doubt but that the governor of Alabama could call the election in Alabama now. He could have called it months ago. The people of Alabama could have elected a Senator to represent them here as the people of Maryland have done, and he could have come here with a certificate from the governor of the State stating that he was the choice of the people in an election duly and properly held, and he would have been given his seat without a word.

If the gentleman who is here claiming an appointment from is entitled to the seat, then the Senator whom we seated from Maryland is not entitled to his seat. You can not say that the people of Maryland can obey the Constitution by electing a Senator and that the governor of Alabama can refuse to obey this mandate and appoint a Senator and we will seat them both. It would make the whole proceedings a farce and would bring down upon the Senate the just indignation of the American people, as it ought, if such an outrage were perpetrated here this afternoon.

If the Senate wants to deprive the people of Alabama of the right to elect their representative here on this floor, it can do it, but it does it openly and boldly, in defiance of the Constitution of the United States, and in defiance of the meaning of the Constitution as it has been declared by a great majority of the Senators here.

I could not let the opportunity pass without expressing my views with what emphasis I can. I am amazed that it should be advocated here with the seriousness that it has been that Mr. Glass is entitled to his seat. If this proposition had been submitted on any day until to-day the majority against Mr. GLASS would have been two to one, or more, and the gentlemen who have seats on this floor know it. I have heard men declare their opinion without reserve that he had no right to the seat, and I am going to watch with some interest the roll call this

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the words just spoken by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow] are to be expected every day from this censor of public morals, whose watchfulness over our conduct here, lest we violate the rules of decency and commit outrages on the people, is possibly pleasing to him, but it is becoming somewhat tiresome to some of us, who feel that we do not need his advice, deserve his censure, or fear his

The Senator says he will watch the roll call to see whether some Senators vote as they said in his presence they would vote.

I am not one of those who are everlastingly seeking to raise himself in the estimation of people elsewhere by suggesting that his celleagues here have to be "watched." As far as I am concerned, I shall exercise my right to vote as I please, even in face of the ominous threat which has just been made against all here who dare disagree with the most honorable Senator from Kansas.

Mr. President, the Senate has long been, and should forever remain, a dignified body. It is supposed to be a body composed largely of learned, distinguished, experienced men of good man-I shall not emulate the Senator's example by indulging in censure. I have reason to remember with kindness some favors he has shown me. But I can not permit his threat to "watch how Senators vote" to pass me without challenging its propriety and protesting against the superior virtue and honesty assumed in such a statement. This is not all, for the honorable Senator goes even further in declaring that we who dare disagree with his conclusions or vote contrary to his will have perpetrated an "outrage" against the people. No Senator here desires to do that. No Senator on this floor is any less willing, I hope, than the Senator from Kansas to serve the people well. The trouble is that too many public men pretend to serve the people with clamorous voice, while the underlying purpose is to serve themselves. Let us see whether or not we who advocate the seating of the gentleman, bearing the uncontested credentials from the proper authorities of the State of Alabama, are "perpetrating an outrage," either on the people of the State of Alabama or on the people of any other State. The people should elect Senators. I am no recent convert to the cause. I hold, among a very few, my title to my seat here by the direct expression of the people's will. Years ago I advocated the principle of the seventeenth amendment on the floor of the other House of Congress. That amendment is before us for proper construction. I find it difficult to proceed in this argument without repeating what has already been said more forcefully by those who have preceded me.

What was the prime purpose, the only object, of the seventeenth amendment? It was, as we all know, simply and solely to change the mode of electing United States Senators. ing more, nothing less. That amendment accomplished its' design by saying that hereafter Senators shall be elected by direct vote of the people and not by the legislature of the State. such election by the people had occurred, then that amendment prescribed how any vacancy in the six-year term of a Senator so elected should be filled. That is all the seventeenth amend ment does and all it ever intended to do. Senatorial terms are fixed by the Constitution. Nothing can lengthen or shorten that senatorial term, no matter how many vacancies may occur in it by death, resignation, or otherwise. The term belongs to the State. The State fills it by her choice of the person, and must, of course, do so in the mode prescribed by the Constitu-In my judgment the State of Alabama has done so in this case. Our lamented colleague, Senator Johnston, was duly chosen by the State of Alabama for a term in the Senate, to which the State of Alabama held an inalienable right. He entered upon the discharge of his duties at the beginning of that term, and until removed by death performed those duties with honor to himself, with credit to his State, and with great profit to our common country. A vacancy thus occurred in that term. That term was not affected by his death, however much the loss of his service is deplored. That term remained the same, and is now the same, unimpaired, unaffected by the misfortune meeting the man holding it. Though his voice is stilled, Alabama's voice in this Chamber must be fully heard or violence results to the most sacred clause in that great instrument.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What is the Senator's view as to the procedure that will follow in case the governor's appointment is ratified by the Senate? Will the succeeding legislature elect or will the people elect, or will Mr. Glass serve to the end of the term for which Senator Johnston was elected?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know when the next legislature will meet in Alabama, but we all know that under the Constitution no appointment to fill a vacancy can exceed the time of the adjournment of the first succeeding legislature.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator misses what I in-

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did not catch the first part of the Senator's question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What I wanted to get in my mind was whether the permanent seating of Mr. Glass following the governor's appointment would be determined by the legislature's election or by an election by the people. Suppose the legislature met before the next election?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is no question as to what would happen under the old Constitution, and my contention is that the amendment does not change it as to existing terms.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, as I understand the Senator, and I do not want to misunderstand him, if the governor makes an appointment to fill the unexpired term, or whatever you may call it, the legislature is the one to ratify that appointment or elect when it meets, and not the people acting under the seventeenth amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There ought to be no difficulty in To me the question is very simple and understanding me. proper and not difficult to answer to my own satisfaction. There is no necessity of evasion. There is nothing to dodge. My construction of the seventeenth amendment coincides exactly with the construction of it so clearly and convincingly set forth by the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] in the luminous address to which we have listened. I go now, as I went from the first, to the full limit that Senator Bradley has To put my conclusions in a word, so that no Senator may misunderstand my opinion, I do not hesitate to say that seventeenth amendment has nothing to do with and never intended to have any change made in the manner of filling the vacancies that might happen in the terms of Senators sitting at the time the constitutional amendment was ratified. The mode of filling vacancies in these terms was unchanged by the amendment. Therefore the appointment by the governor of Alabama of one to fill the vacancy in the term of Senator Johnson until the next meeting of the legislature was not only proper but imperative, and gave Mr. Glass as clear a title to a seat here as is held by any Member on this floor. The State of Alabama is not trying to avoid the amendment. She is acting within her rights; nay, more, she is performing a duty she owes the Constitution in the only constitutional way open to her. In my judgment the governor of Alabama has no power to call an election of Senators. But if he had called one, and the people had elected a Senator, I would vote to seat him, as I voted in the Maryland case.

In this case you opponents invoke a narrow and strained construction of a new amendment, to destroy an essential part of the old charter which lovers of our Government revere, and no man wished or expected to affect by the adoption of the amendment. The amendment in plain language prevented such a catastrophe, by providing that the "term" should not be affected by the amendment; that the State should not be deprived of equal representation on this floor. And so careful was the amendment itself to secure and preserve such constant representation that it secured to all terms which were to begin under it an equally speedy manner of filling vacancies, and preserved the full status quo of all present terms, by declaring in effect that vacancies occurring in any present terms should not be affected by the amendment.

There is now, and was then, no possible way of "affecting the term" for which a senator was chosen, except by changing the mode or manner of filling vacancies. Recognizing this, the amendment provided the mode of filling all future vacancies occurring in terms which begin after its ratification, and to make its purpose clear and unmistakable, it declared that Senators heretofore chosen, and the terms for which they were chosen, shall not be affected by this amendment. It declares that we, the people, are prescribing the mode for the election of future Senators, not the present ones. We are not molesting you nor putting States to trouble and expense and waste of time by a new and expensive mode for filling vacancies that may occur by your death, nor force the States without present machinery available to remain for months or years unrepresented in the Senate, and thus nullify the constitutional guaranty of equal representation of each State in the Senate of the United

Mr. President, I am not one of those so reckless of the rights of the people in any State that I stand ready to disfranchise them here on trivial technicalities. I am not hunting flaws to defeat equal representation on this floor. Those Senators who are preventing-or, as I hope, vainly trying to prevent-such equal representations here may have more wisdom than I, but no more reverence for the Constitution. I am not hunting quibbles to use as excuse for robbing a State, for if I were, I would have voted against seating the honorable Senator from Maryland and have furnished fully as potent reasons for such vote as anyone here who is opposing the credentials handed us by the State authorities of Alabama. Who is complaining Has Alabama sent a word of protest? Has any citizen of Alabama raised a voice against the action of the governor or the propriety of the appointment or the qualifications of the man appointed? Who challenges this seat? Not those most interested in having this vacancy filled. I forbear to press the question further than to say your gratuitous guardianship of that State costs you nothing, your unwilling ward must pay the costs of administration and suffer the consequences of your superior knowledge of the law which we ourselves wrote and disagree on its meaning. Maryland put one construction on its meaning and we seated her choice. Alabama put another—and I think the proper construction—on the meaning of the words, and this Senate is dividing very evenly on whether that construction is right.

The man in whose legal judgment I have such confidence and who flatters me now with his attention, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley], whose argument stamps him as a great lawyer, has maintained with signal force that Alabama is correct in the attitude assumed by her, and that Mr. Glass is entitled to his seat. On the other hand, I find my friend from Montana [Mr. Walsh], equally learned in that great profession, denying that contention and asserting with great force and earnestness that Mr. Glass is not entitled to his seat; that Maryland was right and Alabama wrong in their respective understanding of the amendment. In this disagreement of titanic minds, what are you and I to do, Senators, except, as suggested by Senator Bankhead, use our own common sense and judgment, ascertain therefrom what is right and just, and act on the conviction.

There is nothing here threatening the stability of our Government. There will, pray God, be so few recurrences of vacancies in terms of sitting Members that no precedent can be established by our vote here that can affect future cases, because before any other Senators are chosen every State will have provided the means of filling vacancies, under the seventeenth amendment, and all these disturbing wrangles will become, in political importance, a closed book.

But, for the sake of argument, let us concede that I am wrong in my construction. Let us admit that all vacancies occurring in all terms, present and future, must be filled in the mode prescribed by the amendment, and you opponents of the right of Mr. Glass to his seat still meet an unsurmountable difficulty. The amendment prescribes that—

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancy by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

No one questions that if empowered by the legislature the governor, under this language, could name a person to fill the vacancy in a senatorial term. If the governor at the time the vacancy occurred had the power to fill the vacancy under an existing law of the State, then it would be not only useless but criminal and silly for him to call, at great expense to the people of his State, an extraordinary session of the legislature to confer on him power that he already held by act of the legislature.

The Alabama statute has been so often read in this debate that I need only say that it confers on the governor the power to fill all vacancies in all State offices not otherwise provided for in the act. The words that "he shall appoint to fill the unexpired term" do not affect his power to appoint to fill the existing vacancy. If a constitutional mandate or any superior law or subsequent enactment shall intervene to simply shorten the tenure of the person so appointed "to fill the unexpired term," that fact does not affect the original power to make the appointment nor stay the right of the appointee to assume the office and exercise its functions for the time being. But in order to save your contention you are forced to the monstrous assertion that a Member of the United States Senate is not a State officer. Away with such a doctrine. We bear our commissions from our respective States. If you resign, you send your resignation not to any Federal authority but to your State. No Federal power can fill a vacancy in the Senate. Show me a case in all the books that holds even by implication that a United States Senator is a Federal officer as distinguished from a State officer.

Every case cited here that can be tortured to such a conclusion will be found to turn on and to decide the question whether a certain position held by an individual in a State and receiving his pay from the State or some municipal subdivision of the State was an officer or an employee of the State or municipality. The language used by the courts in deciding such cases has been kidnaped and dragged here and put under duress and forced to proclaim political heresies as the solemn judgments of the have no doubt that you Senators are officers of your States; that a vacancy in your term is a vacancy in an office of your State which can and must be filled, under any construction you may place on the seventeenth amendment, through appointment by the governor, where he has been empowered by the legislature to fill vacancies occurring in all State offices. If this case is decided against Alabama by your votes, then I concede that it is the duty of the State at the next meeting of the legislature to declare by statute that the governor shall appoint to fill vacancies in senatorial terms, or, following the other prescribed mode, provide for an election to fill such vacancies. I see no self-executing power in the amendment. Therefore I can see no power either in the Alabama statute or in the amendment under which the governor can call an election to fill the vacancy. Yet I am free to say that if such call is concurred in by the people of the State, and by their votes one is sent here to fill this vacancy, I will as freely vote to seat him as I voted under like conditions to seat the Senator from Maryland. In this course I am not disregarding the Constitution, but adhering to one of its most important provisions, to wit, securing the full representation at all times of each State in the Senate of the

Mr. President, as I said before, there is nobody from Alabama disputing the right of Mr. GLASS to this seat. comes from the people most interested. No voice is heard in protest outside of this Chamber. If seated, the incumbent will only hold until the meeting of the next legislature. The State is trying to violate the Constitution or evade it. It has done neither. The governor showed his purpose to comply with the requirements of the Constitution by seeking and following the advice of the ablest lawyers in the State, including the attorney general and chief justice of the supreme court. In my judgment, they advised him wisely, and he wisely and patriotically followed their advice. The people of Alabama are satisfied. No governor ever lived who could suppress their protest if he acted against their will in a matter of such importance. Their silence is an assurance of their acquiescence. Who, then, should complain?

Mr. President, I have sworn here to protect and defend the Constitution. It needed no oath to insure my allegiance. In voting that the gentleman from Alabama shall be admitted here, I am protecting the Constitution. I am defending the fifth article against a false construction of the seventeenth amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to deliver a judicial decision in this case. The discussion to which I have listened and the papers that I have read treating the subject matter involved are variant and conflicting. The able arguments delivered on either side have generated in my mind an element of doubt regarding the constitutional regu-larity in both the case of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Lee | and that of the senatorial appointee from Alabama [Mr. GLASS]. But I do not think the irregularities are such as to nullify or to vitiate the commission or defeat the right of either of these gentlemen to a seat in the Senate. Mr. Lee has been sented; Mr. Glass, I trust, may be seated.

Now, I want to say that I yield to no man in my ardent advocacy of the election of Senators by the people. I favored the election of Senators by the people when some of the gentlemen who have grown red in the face in their vociferous denunciation of Mr. Glass's commission were statesmen "to fortune and to fame unknown."

If the governor of Maryland was authorized by a law enacted prior to the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to order an election, and the election was held under that law, I can not see how Senators can maintain that the governor may not appoint to fill temporarily a vacancy, when authorized to do so by a law enacted prior to the adoption of the seventeenth amendment, which law is not at variance with the terms of the seventeenth amendment, but rather in harmony with its provisions. I prefer the method employed by the governor of Maryland to fill the senatorial vacancy. I prefer the election by the people to all offices; but the governor of Alabama, so far as I know, a man of very high character, learned in the law, patriotic and courageous in the performance of his official duties, who, acting by and under the advice of the highest legal authority of his State, the attorney general and the members of the supreme court, in appointing Mr. Glass employed what he believed to be and what I am not prepared to deny was the only method by which the vacancy in the United States Senate from Alabama could be filled at this time.

In view of all of these facts, Mr. President, considering the diversity of views, the conflicting opinions, the variety of conclusions by men learned in the law, I repeat, while a doubt as to the regularity exists in my mind, I am going to resolve that doubt in favor of the State of Alabama and permit her to enjoy the privilege, which is a right guaranteed by the Constitution, of having two representatives in the Senate of the United States; and for that reason I shall vote to seat Mr. GLASS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before making any comment on this question I ask leave to have printed in the Rec-ORD as a part of my remarks, so that it will be better understood to what portion of the documents I refer, first, the old provision of the Constitution, section 3 of Article I-

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

cut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. We are unable to hear the Senator from Connecticut on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall endeavor to overcome the slight noise that pervades the Chamber and will repeat that I will ask to have printed as a part of my remarks section 3 of Article I of the Constitution as it existed before the adoption of this seventeenth amendment, providing of what the membership of the Senate shall consist, as indicated on pages 186 and 187 of the manual, down to the middle of page 187, where provision is made as to the Vice President, which has nothing to do with the Senate. to do with the Senate.

Then I want also to have printed the amendment to the Constitution which was passed in the Sixty-second Congress, first session, which was known as House joint resolution No. 39. It was passed by the Senate on June 12, 1911, and an enrolled copy deposited with the Secretary of State May 16, 1912, and now known as the seventeenth amendment. I also ask to have printed sections 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18 of the United States Statutes, revision of 1878, providing what the procedure of the State legislatures shall be in the election of Senators under the old Constitution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Constitution before the seventeenth amendment.]

Sec. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the form the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if yacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he chall be cheen. who shall not, whe

[Amendment of the Constitution.]

ARTICLE XVII.

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

[From the Revised Statutes, Revision of 1878.] ELECTION OF SENATORS.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Sec. 14. The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress. Sec. 15. Such election shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from such State, and the name of the person so voted for, who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house, shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof; or if either house fails to give such majority to any person on that day, the fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house he shall be declared duly elected Senator. But if the same person has not received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house has failed to take proceedings as required by this section, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for Senator, and the person who receives a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the embers elected to both house being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected. If no person receives such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and shall take at least one vote, until a Senator is elected.

Sec. 16. Whenever on the meeting of the legislature of any State a vacancy exists in the representation of such State in the Senate, the legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after meeting a term.

SEC. 17. Whenever during the session of the legislature of any State a vacancy occurs in the representation of such State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized and has notice of such vacancy.

SEC. 18. It shall be the duty of the executive of the State from which any Senator has been chosen to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not myself think that the distinction which several Senators, and, last of all, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], have attempted to draw between the word "chosen" and the word "elected" has any force whatever in enabling us to interpret this constitutional provision. The old Constitution provided that:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, "chosen" by the legislature thereof.

The very next paragraph provides that:

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the st "election" they shall be divided as equally as may be into three

A little further down it is provided that vacancies may be "filled" by the executive of the State "until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then 'fill' such vacancies." Then it is provided that:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when "elected" be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be "chosen."

It appears all the way through both the Constitution and the statutes that the use of the words "chosen" and "elected" is perfectly immaterial. Apparently no difference in meaning exists between them. The United States Revised Statutes provide, in section 14, that-

The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was "elected" to represent such State in Congress shall—

And so forth. Section 15 provides that— Such "election" shall be conducted in the following manner,

Further down it is provided that-

He shall be declared duly "elected" Senator.

And further down it is provided that the legislature daily shall take at least one vote, until a Senator is 'elected.'

All that is provided under the language of the Constitution, which says that the legislature shall "choose" a Senator, and also the further language which says they shall "fill" a vacancy. I do not think there is any hope whatever in seeking to derive any inspiration from the use of the terms "chosen" and "elected." That interchangeability of the two terms "chosen" and "elected" pervades all the sections of the statutes which I have put into the RECORD.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow], that what Congress intended to do and what the people who ratified the seventeenth amendment intended to do was to provide that, after the amendment became a valid part of the Constitution, Senators should be elected by the people instead of by the legislatures of the States. Everybody knows that is what the intention was

The whole controversy existing at present, it seems to me. arises from what might be called the excessive prudential pre-caution which either the committee or somebody else was at pains to attach as, to some extent, an explanation, which has served to render a plain proposition somewhat confused, if not badly confounded, when they said:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

In my opinion the sole meaning of this clause is that the Senators whose terms had not expired at the time when the amendment became operative as part of the Constitution should continue as Senators, although they had been elected by legislatures instead of by the people, as prescribed by the amendment.

Omitting the proviso that-This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or rm of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Con-

Omitting that as a work of supererogation, where does this case stand?

Mr. President, I will say in passing that it is my disposition to go to the utmost limit in trying to do the fair thing and the sensible thing in acting upon the credentials of those who have been chosen, even apparently, according to the law of the country. I never have—and trust I never shall—attempt to take advantage of any so-called technicality or slight irregularity if it is evident from the general result of an election that the people intended to seat a certain person. Therefore I started out in the consideration of this case with a disposition to give the appointee of the governor of Alabama who has presented his credentials here not only a fair show but I was predisposed, if possible, to vote to seat him. However, when the Constitution provides that a Senator must be elected by the people, that when a vacancy occurs the governor shall issue a writ of election and have an election to fill the vacancy, and that the legislature of the State "may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct," the legislature having that privilege to authorize the executive neglects entirely to do so or declines to do so, and the governor refuses to issue the writ for an election, I myself can not see that the gentleman presenting credentials from the governor, appointed in the old way under the old Constitution, which we intended to repeal and thought we had repealed, has any standing whatever in court.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does not the Senator think that the power given by the seventeenth amendment to the governor to appoint in a certain contingency and for a certain purpose precludes his power to appoint in any other contingency or for any other purpose, the power of the governor to appoint flowing solely from the Constitution of the United States and not, thus far, from the laws of any State?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so beyond question. where a person has no power and power is attempted to be conferred the document which attempts to confer the power has to be strictly construed, and that it confers only what is specifically mentioned or necessarily implied therefrom, just as the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress only such powers as are specially conferred or are necessarily incidental to those which are specially conferred. It is a grant of power and not a reservation.

Mr. President, in that view of it, the constitutional amendment providing that the Legislature of the State of Alabama might authorize the executive thereof to make a temporary appointment until the people could fill the vacancy by an election, and the legislature not having done so, the appointment by the governor is as void as any other illegal act, and the vacancy exists as though the governor had never attempted to make an appointment

The governor had no right to make this appointment. Those who claim he had base their claim upon a State statute which provides how the governor of the State of Alabama may appoint regular officers of the State in case of a vacancy, to serve out unexpired terms, but that statute of the State of Alabama can not operate to give the governor of that State the power to appoint a United States Senator, who is an officer of the United States and not an officer of the State of Alabama at all, in the face of the constitutional amendment that has just been ratified by the people for the purpose of insuring the election of Senators by the people. So that I say that the passage by the Legislature of Alabama of an enabling act conferring upon the chief executive of that State authority to make this appointment until the people can elect is as necessary a part of the title of the appointee who applies to be seated as anything in the Constitution could be.

As I have stated, it is my disposition not to be overtechnical about these matters; still, when the Constitution prescribes what the title of a Senator shall be, what the conditions precedent and necessary shall be to his being a legal Senator, I can not see how any one of them can be ignored any more than any other; and I consider this to be an essential part of the title of the appointee of the governor of Alabama.

This view is no surprise to the State of Alabama nor to its executive nor to any of the voters of Alabama. This matter was brought to their attention, and they considered it thor-As soon as the vacancy occurred they had ample warning of the views of many Senators, both on the Judiciary Committee and on the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the governor at any time could have called a special session of general assembly and recommended that they give him authority to appoint a Senator, but he would not or did not

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President— Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Right there I want to ask the Senator from Connecticut if there is not a clause in the constitution of the State of Alabama forbidding him to do so?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Forbidding him to call a special session of the legislature?

Yes; for that purpose. Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I can not say as to that; I do not know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand there is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well, if that is so-

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand there is a clause in the constitution of the State of Alabama forbidding the governor to call special sessions of the legislature, except to provide appropriations and matters of that kind.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I withdraw that statement. Of course the question which the Senator from Mississippi has raised is a matter of fact, about which I have no knowledge; but I hear it stated by Senators sitting upon this side of the Chamber that the Senator from Mississippi is mistaken about that. But, however that may be, it does not go to the merits of this controversy at all. Whether or not the governor could have called the legislature in extra session, the legislature can at any time pass a statute authorizing the governor to fill this vacancy until the people elect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHER-MAN] this afternoon in his remarks read the provision of the constitution of Alabama which authorizes the governor to call special sessions of the legislature.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—
Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I find that I was mistaken a moment ago. I thought that the State of Alabama had in its constitution a similar clause to that in the constitution of the State of Mississippi; but I find it has not. The governor can designate anything as the subject of consideration of a special session in Alabama; and I therefore desire to withdraw the remark I made a few moments ago.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, we have both with-drawn now; but, as I have said, I do not consider that at all a fundamental consideration in the discussion of this question.

I do not want at this late hour to occupy unduly the time of the Senate. I am aware that many Senators have gone into this natter exhaustively. I have not spoken with the idea of in-fluencing any other Senator in the matter. I think Senators have probably fairly made up their minds about this case; but my mind has not been made up about it until very recently, because I wanted to hold it open to the last minute to see if I could get any light that would enable me to favor the appointee who comes here from Alabama and to favor his State. I should like to do so, and I would rather do so than not; but I can not do so, and inasmuch as I expect to vote against him I did not think I ought merely to cast a vote and not state my reasons therefor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it is fortunate that the question of partisan politics as ordinarily understood can not be charged as entering into this discussion. It is a question which ought to be decided upon its merits. I speak of partisan politics in the sense that the representatives of the two opposing parties of the country are not arrayed against each other on this matter. I do not know what influence may have arisen lately, reaching, perhaps, into the future, with a view to affecting something that may occur hereafter. I do not know sufficiently to state it as a fact that a future election in Alabama may be at stake in this controversy. I can not tell what influence that idea has had upon this discussion or will have upon the votes. I think I am stating the truth, however, when I say that at the time when this vacancy occurred and up until very recently there was very little difference of opinion among Senators or among the people conversant with it as to the meaning of the seventeenth amendment to the Federal Constitution. It has been conceded by nearly everyone that the people were in favor of the direct election of United States Senators, and by the ratification of three-fourths of the States it was made the law of the land.

It is a fact, however, that Alabama did not ratify, and has not ratified, the constitutional amendment and has not made any provision for meeting the emergency of a vacancy. stated that Alabama has had no session of her legislature since the amendment was ratified. But that is no answer to the argument, or to the inference at least, that those in charge of affairs in that State may be opposed to the direct election of United States Senators. It is certain that when the governor appointed a gentleman to fill the vacancy soon after the death of the late Senator Johnston he knew that the Senate was opposed to that method of filling the vacancy. He had the power at that time, and had it for eight months thereafter to call a session of the legislature for the purpose of making provision for filling the vacancy, so that Alabama could be represented in this body by two Senators. He has not done so. Alabama is denied two Senators by her own consent, if we are to assume that her governor's conduct and action represent the sentiment of the State. I can not believe that it does, but the citizens of Alabama must look to their governor, and not to the Senate, as the cause of her lack of full representation here.

Mr. President, I deny that those who oppose the seating of Mr. Glass are basing their opposition upon technicalities. On the contrary, every argument in favor of seating this gentleman is based upon technicalities. We found our contention upon the letter and spirit of the Constitution as well as upon the will of the people.

The clear meaning to the ordinary citizen of the seventeenth amendment is that it compels the election of United States Senators exactly as Representatives in Congress are electedby the people—and it as clearly provides that vacancies in the Senate are to be filled exactly as are vacancies in the House; and yet if we seat Mr. GLASS we do it as under the old Constitution, and our action will mean that the seventeenth amendment will not become operative in some possible cases until 1921. The Senator elect from Louisiana, who will not take his seat until March 4, 1915, will be a Senator elected under the old system, and a vacancy in his seat for any cause can not be filled except by the governor, if the proponents of this amendment prevail.

I do not believe that any such construction can be properly put upon the seventeenth amendment, or that any such construction should be put upon it. The ordinary layman understands the meaning of this amendment and that the ratification of the appointment of Mr. Glass by the Senate would be a violation of the people's registered will. We, as Senators, ought to be the very last to violate a law or constitutional provision which we helped to make.

We submitted this question to the people. We thought we were serving them and complying with their wishes. I think we were. If we seat Mr. Glass, we must do it regardless of the spirit of the recently amended Constitution, and I for one can not vote to do that.

There can be no partisan influence which induces me to take this position. It is not a question between seating a Democrat by the governor, but the people of Alabama have a right to elect their own Senator. If they want Mr. Glass, they will elect him. If the governor of that State refuses to comply with the fundamental law of the land by failing to issue a writ of election, the people of his State will understand the place to visit their condemnation. It is the governor of Alabama, and not the Senate of the United States, who is denying to Alabama her full representation in this body. It seems to me, however, to make much difference to the standing of the Senate before the country whether we shall obey the spirit of the amendment or whether we shall find an excuse for evading it.

So, Mr. President, without any malice, without any partisan feeling, but actuated solely by a desire to carry out the spirit of the amendment which I helped pass, I feel it is my duty to vote not to seat Mr. GLASS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I desire the indulgence of the Senate for just a moment while I give my view in a plain, ordinary way, and seeking to go to the right of the matter as the Senator from Alabama did, without reference to the technicalities of the case.

My understanding is that the seventeenth amendment was passed because, among other things, of the scandals that at times had been created in State legislatures by the senatorial question, and that we then intended to provide an absolutely new way of electing Members of this body. By that amendment we did two things. We took away from the legislatures the right to elect and we modified or restricted the right of the governor to appoint.

As I understand, the right of the governor or the executive of a State to make an appointment of a Senator flows directly from the Constitution, and from no other source. old law as it stood, in case of a vacancy happening by death or resignation, the governor could appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, which should then choose the successor of the Senator removed by death or resignation.

Under the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution we, in effect, take away from the governor that right to appoint, but we confer upon the governor another right to appoint, to wit, the right to appoint temporarily, when the legislature shall so direct by specific law, until the people themselves shall have voted under the operation of this amendment. So it seems to me the right to appoint under the seventeenth amendment is a different thing from the right to appoint under the old Constitution.

It is urged on all sides that the governor of Alabama is appointing by virtue of his right under the old Constitution. In view of the evident intention of the Houses of Congress in proposing this amendment, and the evident intention of the people in agreeing to it through their several legislatures. I can not conceive how they could have had in view any right of appointment for the governor except the right to make temporary appointment until the people should elect. The amendment goes farther and says that before he shall have that right to appoint the legislature must sanction the same by laws properly passed for that purpose.

In that view of the case I can not conceive any theory upon which this appointment by the governor of Alabama can be

Mr. BANKHEAD. Before the Senator takes his seat, I quite agree with the Senator that the purpose of the seventeenth amendment was to secure the election of Senators by the people. I do not think there is any difference of opinion on that subject. I desire, however, to ask the Senator this question: When do the people elect a Senator under the provisions of that amendment in case of a vacancy such as we now have in

If the seventeenth amendment was intended to go into effect immediately after its adoption, no State in the Union was prepared to put it into effect. Alabama certainly was not, and could not put it into effect in 30, 60, or 90 days. What I wish to ask the Senator is, What becomes of that provision of the Constitution, which can not be changed by constitutional amendment or otherwise, which says that no State shall be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate without its consent?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course the answer to that question is that by not complying with the provisions of the s teenth amendment the State of Alabama has waived its right to representation until such time as it accredits a Senator here under the provisions and conditions of the seventeenth amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It has consented.
Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We have had here in the Senate, time and time again, cases where the legislatures have failed to elect; we have had cases where legislatures have failed to and seating a Republican. It is conceded that the State of Alabama can and will elect a Democrat, and she probably could do no better than to elect the gentleman who has been appointed | elect and governors have appointed, where the Senate refused the State equal representation in the Senate, simply because the State, having had the opportunity to act, had falled to take advantage of its opportunity.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes; but I do not think those cases are at all parallel with this one. In those cases there was no change at all effected in the Constitution.

I do not know whether I make myself understood or not; but the point I am trying to make is this: The Senator from Wyoming will concede that there was no machinery of any kind in Alabama, or in any other State in the Union, when this amendment was ratified, authorizing the governor to make a temporary appointment, and authorizing him to issue a writ of election to fill a vacancy by direct vote of the people. Do I make myself clear there? That being true, is it the fault of Alabama that she did not immediately fill this vacancy according to the supposed provisions of the Constitution? She could She had not had an opportunity to do it. Therefore, in that view of the case, it seems to me the Congress of the United States is to blame, and not Alabama.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. During the lapse of all these months it can hardly be urged that the Congress of the United States is to blame, when Alabama has had the opportunity, at least by this time, to protect herself in that particular.

I simply rose, however, to give a reason for my vote. lieve the seventeenth amendment takes away from the governor of a State the right to appoint in any case except where the legislature has provided a method in which the appointing power shall be exercised, and that the governor of Alabama in assuming to make this appointment under the old provisions of the Constitution and not under the provisions of and in compliance with the requirements of the seventeenth amendment acted without constitutional authority, and hence such appointment void, and the appointee neither does nor can acquire any rights thereunder.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel justified in trespassing upon the patience of the Senate for a few moments to conclude this debate, since apparently no one else desires to talk upon

I congratulate the Senate, and the country as well, that one ground urged before the committee in favor of seating Mr. GLASS has found the advocacy of no voice whatever upon this floor. I regard it as a subject for general congratulation. It was there urged, as I pointed out to you in opening this debate on yesterday morning, that the constitutional amendment would not be in force in any particular State until that State, in the absence of congressional legislation, should make adequate provision by law for the holding of a senatorial election, and that until that time arrived Members of the Senate from such a State not having so provided would be elected under the old

I say no one has been heard to advocate such a doctrine as that on this floor. That leaves but two grounds on which anyone can justify a vote in favor of the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson]. One is that a vacancy in the seat of any Senator sitting at the time the amendment was adopted is not to be filled under the provisions of the amendment, but is to be filled under the provisions of the old Constitution. The other is that the statute of Alabama authorizes the filling of this vacancy.

A man may be able to justify himself in voting in favor of the substitute resolution upon the ground last urged, namely, that the statute of Alabama authorizes it; but there is no man—and we might as well meet squarely the situation with which we are confronted—who can justify himself in the forum of his own conscience in voting to seat Mr. Lee and then voting to seat Mr. GLASS upon the ground that the vacancy is to be filled under the provisions of the old Constitution.

We have determined in the case of Mr. LEE, and it stands here as a precedent for all time, that a vacancy such as this is to be filled under the provisions of the amendment by an election or by an appointment under the authority of the amendment. We may vote to seat Mr. Glass, but let us not attempt to deceive ourselves into the belief that we can any longer justify our action upon the ground that the vacancy is to be filled under the provisions of the old Constitution. That claim has been disposed of.

Although it has been disposed of, we have yet witnessed the spectacle here of men who voted to seat Mr. Lee advocating that doctrine. So I wish to trespass upon your patience for a moment simply to state what is contended by the committee in that behalf. It is that the third clause of the amendment to the Constitution was meant simply to preserve to the sitting Members, Members who were here at the time the amendment was adopted, the right to continue to sit in this body as Members thereof for whatever period they were entitled to termination I might make in a controversy of this character; hold their places under their election or appointment; that it went that far and no farther; but that it was intended that after it became valid all vacancies should be filled under the provisions of the amendment. I think that is the way it was generally understood at all times before the question arose here in connection with these vacancies.

I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the merits of that question now, further than to answer a question that is asked by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley]—and I ask particularly the attention of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Smith], who reiterated it—" What then, was the use of putting in this provision at all, since, as a matter of course, the old Senators would hold for the period for which they had been elected or appointed?"

Mr. President, a clause in a statute to the effect that nothing therein contained shall be construed in a certain way is not intended to change, and never does change, the meaning of what has gone before. It is simply intended to prevent what has gone before from being given a certain construction which it was intended should not be given to it; that is all.

Why, some one might say, after the seventeenth amendment was adopted, "You, Senator Walsh, are not entitled to sit in this body. You were not elected by the people, and the Constitution provides that Senators shall be elected by a vote of the people." The validity of my election might otherwise be questioned upon that ground. It was intended that it should not be questioned. The election having taken place prior to the adoption of the amendment, it was intended that no one should be heard to say it was void.

Again, some one might say: "Although your election was valid, it was intended that you should serve only until the next general election, when the people should have an opportunity to express their choice at the polls. In other words, you can hold only until an election could be held." It might be argued that though my election could not be questioned, my term would be cut short.

It was intended that no such contention should be made. It was intended not only that the election should be considered as valid, but that the sitting Members should be permitted to sit out the full period of their terms.

It is said that the word "term" means merely a period of time, six years. Suppose it does. Then it means that the period of time, six years, from the beginning to the end of Senator Johnston's term shall not be affected by this amendment.

Undoubtedly the word "term" as it is used has as it is used has more than an impersonal significance. Senator Jackson was not elected. and according to the construction which you are urged to give to the word "term," Senator Jackson had no term; he was filling the unexpired term of the late Senator Rayner. Senator

THOMAS, they tell you, has no term.

Consider the case of Senator Jackson. The amendment says, "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term," and so forth. Senator Jackson was not election of term, and so forth. Senator Jackson was not elected, and if he did not have any term Senator Jackson was in no way protected by the third clause of the amendment. You can not give it that construction. It was intended that Senator Jackson should sit here until his successor should be duly elected. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley] was forced to admit, by making no direct response to my inquiry, that giving to the language the construction he assigns to it Senator Jackson was accorded no protection at all by the third clause of the amendment.

But what is the use of debating that matter now? We settled it the other day when we seated Senator Lee. We de-clared that the new amendment is in effect and force; and under its provisions we must determine whether or not a man is entitled to sit here, whether or not he does in fact represent the people whom he purports to represent.

So let us not deceive ourselves. There is absolutely nothing left in this case upon which any man can justify a vote here in favor of Mr. Glass unless he is prepared to accept the doctrine that the statute of the State of Alabama is effective to permit an appointment under the seventeenth amendment.

I wish to review that statute with you for a few moments. Bear in mind, my esteemed associates and colleagues, that we are making history here; that future generations will pore over the pages of this day's proceedings, and that we shall be judged by posterity for our acts here to-day. Yea, more, sir: Who is there that shall undertake to say under what strange combination of circumstances in the future, when the very life of the Nation may be at stake, some one may not appeal to the adjudication made in this eventful case?

Mr. President, I should despise myself if any consideration but, sir, if it did, I assert as an indisputable proposition that has thus far guided my political action that the wise and politic thing to do under any and all circumstances is to do the right thing.

What is this statute? It provides:

That when any office of the State, of any county, or municipality thereof, is vacant from death, resignation, removal from the municipality, county, or State, or because the former incumbent absconds, or because an incumbent has been removed for ineligibility, or when the office is vacant from any other cause, and there is no way provided by law for the filling of such vacant office, the governor is hereby empowered and required to appoint a qualified person to fill the unexpired term of such office.

We are immediately confronted with the question whether a United States Senator is an officer of the State and whether his office is an office of the State.

Reference has been made in this connection to various provisions of the Constitution of the United States, to various clauses therein indicating that within the purview and meaning of those particular clauses a United States Senator is not an officer of the United States. I shall undertake to show you in just a few minutes that even the Supreme Court of the United States found a great deal of difficulty in classifying this office and designating its character. Bear in mind that no decision of any court, no decision of any legislative body, no decision even of the governor of any State, outside of this particular instance, has been referred to in support of the view that a United States Senator is a State officer. It is said, however, that because within the purview of these provisions of the Constitution of the United States he is not a United States officer, it follows of necessity that he is a State officer.

The conclusion does not follow by any means. I fear what was said in the report of the committee upon this subject could not have received very earnest attention from some of the Senators who have presumed to discuss the matter. I trust I shall not be particularly disagreeable to you if I impose upon your patience until I read briefly what was there said.

After referring to these provisions of the Constitution of the United States which exclude Members of Congress from the category of officers of the United States, we say:

But it does not by any means follow that because Senators and Representatives are not within the purview of particular provisions of the Constitution or of particular Federal statutes referring to officers of the United States they are necessarily officers of the States, respectively, from which they come.

It has been expressly held in Kentucky that Members of the House of Representatives are not "State officers" as that expression is used in the constitution of that State. A provision thereof required that certain vacancies should be filled by election "at the next succeeding annual election at which either city, town, county, district, or State officers are to be elected." It was held that the office could not be filled at a November election at which only Members of the House of Representatives were elected.

But it is said that there is some essential difference, with respect to the character of these officers, between Representatives and Senators. The very language of the Constitution with respect to each of them is the same.

Section 2 of Article I says:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

Section 3 of the same article says, in exactly the same lan-

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof.

But this is a matter of no great significance. The Supreme Court of the State of Kentucky was considering a particular provision of the State constitution in the cases referred to, and it held that within the purview of that particular provision, considering the purpose that was to be subserved by it, and considering the conditions and circumstances which gave rise to it, the words "State officer," as therein used, did not include Members of the House of Representatives. Under some other circumstances they might have held differently; that is to say, the words "State officer" may be given one significance in one statute and may be given a broader or a narrower significance in another, depending upon what was in the mind of the legislature at the time the statute was enacted.

Of course, if the language is clearly broad enough, it does not make any difference what was actually intended, the interpretation must be in accordance with the language used, unless restricted in its sense by the context or other consideration. But the expression here is not comprehensive. The language is not apt to include United States Senators or Representatives.

Let me continue reading from the report:

Language found in the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller in Ex parte Yarborough (110 U. S., 657) clearly implies that in the opinion of that tribunal Members of Congress are not State officers. We read therein as follows:

"The day fixed for electing Members of Congress has been established by Congress without regard to the time set for election of State officers in each State."

If the Supreme Court of the United States had believed that Members of Congress are State officers, of course they would have said:

The day fixed for electing Members of Congress has been established by Congress without regard to the time set for election of other State officers in each State.

But they did not say so. We continue:

Indeed, that court apparently found some difficulty in classifying the position, for it said in the case referred to that "the office [Members of Congress], if it be properly called an office, is created by the Constitution and by that alone."

I continue reading from the report:

The Constitution not only creates the office of United States Senator, "if it be properly called an office," but it prescribes the duties thereof; it prescribes the qualifications and the disqualifications under which those chosen as such labor. A Senator participates in the work of the National Legislature of which he is an integral part and receives his compensation out of the National Treasury.

The pending tariff bill contains a provision to the effect—
"That in computing net income under this section there shall be excluded * * the compensation of all officers and employees of a State or any political subdivision thereof."

Is there any kind of an idea in the mind of any Member here that—I inquire of my distinguished friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]—under this provision we, the Members of this body, shall be able to escape the income tax? It says "all officers and employees of a State."

says "all officers and employees of a State."

A similar provision was found in the income-tax feature of the act of 1894. In such exceptions is recognized the principle that the Federal Government can not tax the salaries of officers of the State governments. Yet it is the common understanding that the salaries of Members of Congress in both branches must be reported, and such seems to be the inevitable conclusion from the context. By statutory definition Senators and Representatives are not "State officers" in New York. (People v. Nixon, 158 N. Y., 221.)

The language of the Alabama statute is not apt to include United States Senators, and it is scarcely to be conceived that the filling of vacancies in the representation of the State in the Senate was contemplated by the legislature in passing the act in question. The concluding portion of the act reciting that the appointee is to serve for the unexpired portion of the term enforces this conclusion, for under the seventeenth amendment the governor's appointee does not, should the legislature see fit to invest him with the power to appoint, serve for the remainder of the unexpired term, but only until an election can be held as the legislature may direct.

Mr. President, it is suggested in this connection that if the

Mr. President, it is suggested in this connection that if the governor should appoint by virtue of the constitutional provision the term would in fact cease when his successor had been elected. That is entirely aside from the question. The question is, What did the Legislature of the State of Alabama have in mind when they enacted this statute? This language shows that they did not have in mind this provision of the Constitution, the second clause of the seventeenth amendment, because the language it used is entirely inapt to refer to a condition of that character. In other words, this clearly discloses that the Legislature of Alabama did not intend that it should apply to the case of filling a vacancy by the appointment of the governor under the provisions of the second clause of the seventeenth amendment.

But, Mr. President, there is a better reason than all these why this statute by no possible construction that any lawyer can give it, not to speak about any layman, can not embrace an appointment of this character. That is because it is made in the very teeth of the language of this statute. It provides that the governor of the State may fill a vacancy which occurs in an office when no provision is made by law for filling that vacancy.

Mr. President, the clause of the amendment invoked starts out by saying "when vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Suppose Suppose there were a statute of the State of Alabama providing that whenever a vacancy occurs in a particular office the governor of the State of Alabama shall forthwith issue a writ of election to fill that vacancy, would anyone be heard to contend that he might make an appointment under the provisions of this act? The case is provided for.

The amendment provides that the executive authority of the State may make temporary appointment, if authorized by the legislature, until an election can be held by the people.

Mr. President, what is the solemn duty of the governor of Alabama under the seventeenth amendment but forthwith upon its occurrence to issue his writ of election to fill this vacancy? He does not do it. He neglects the duty charged by the law upon him, and then he utilizes that condition of affairs which he has allowed to exist for the long period of eight months in order that he may exercise this doubtful power that may or may not be reposed in him by the sovereign people of the State, as they shall upon reflection determine a power to be employed only to tide over a little period of 30 to 90 days at the outside.

It was intended that as soon as the vacancy occurred the executive authority should issue the writ of election; that the election should be held within 30, 60, or 90 days, and that during that brief intervening period, until an election could be held, he could appoint if the legislature expressly clothed him with that authority. Eight months have gone by and no election has been held in accordance with the obligation cast upon the governor of Alabama by the Constitution.

But, Mr. President, it is said that this provision is otherwise construed in the State of Alabama. It is said it is there construed to mean that the governor has this power. It is said that deference is to be paid to the construction given to this act by the State authorities in Alabama the same as was paid to the acts of the officers of the State of Maryland in the case of Mr. IÆE.

Mr. President, no lawyer will allow himself to be confused by any such suggestion as that. The governor of Alabama has no power in the premises at all until the people of his State solemnly, through the act of their authorized representatives, vest him with that power; and they have never done it. On the other hand, the power is reposed in the people of Maryland by the amendment to elect, and it is simply a question as to whether the procedure by which that power is to be exercised has been provided.

We may give to statutes a very liberal construction when it is a question of carrying out a power which has been conferred, but when it is the very power that is conferred a different principle altogether is applicable. It is idle and absurd to say that we should admit a man from Maryland because one course was pursued there and that we likewise should admit a man from Alabama, because on diametrically Alabama because a diametrically opposite and inconsistent course was followed there.

Mr. President, I do not think that any man who is really reflective about this Alabama statute, who considers the circumstances which gave rise to it, can entertain the idea that it was intended to meet the case before us. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the constitutional amendment contemplated the affirmative subsequent action of the legislature of the State before it could be claimed that the governor was invested with the power of appointment.

The new system, Mr. President, was a radical change from the old, Primarily, under the old system, Senators were elected by the legislature. That system was found to be unsuited to our condition and in violation of the spirit of democracy, resulting naturally and necessarily in the evils which brought its downfall. The people wanted to substitute another system. They felt that they had unwisely confided power to elect Senators to the legislature; they desired to reinvest themselves with that power, and they believed they had

In that same amendment they said, however, that if in any particular State the people believed it would be wise or prudent to invest their governor with the power to make a temporary appointment, which at the outside would ordinarily last only for a period of 30 or 60 or 90 days, they were at liberty to do it; that each separate State is required to decide that question for itself. The people of Alabama have a right to be heard upon that question. They have never considered it. They have never been called upon to consider it. They may or may not be willing again to give up to their governor a part of the power they have recalled. It is enough for us to know that they never

Mr. President, this is a question which rises far above any consideration of political or party expediency. It is a question which rises far above personal relations or personal consider-

I protest, Mr. President, against the assertion and charge that anybody is endeavoring to prevent the seating of Mr. GLASS upon any technicality whatever or attempting to deny to Alabama equal representation here. I put the case, sir, upon the solid ground that the people of the State of Alabama are entitled to go to the polls and there declare whom they desire as their representative in this body; and upon that rock, which is far from an appeal to any technicality, I stand. shall be no party to any course, by whatever speciousness of reasoning it may be supported, that denies to them the right so to make their choice.

I warn most earnestly my associates and colaborers here that we shall be charged, and with a force we can not repel, from every husting in this country, from one ocean to the other, with denying to the people of the State of Alabama their solemn right to go to the polls and there express their choice for their representative if we shall do otherwise than support the resolution here tendered on behalf of the committee.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, in the short time I have been about and in this honorable body I have been deeply im-Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, in the short time I have been about and in this honorable body I have been deeply impressed with respect for the chairman and the gentlemen who constitute the membership of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and it is with the greatest diffidence that I venture on this occasion, so early in my membership here, to address the Senate, differing from a committee which the other day placed me in this body and for whose opinion upon constitutional questions I have so profound a respect. But it does seem, Mr. President, that I would be really lacking in respect to this committee and to the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] who has just addressed the Senate if I did not in some sense undertake to explain a difference of view upon this subject and upon this occasion.

The Senator from Montana mentioned a very pertinent fact just now. He said that only for a little while would the seating of Mr. Glass operate. In fact, it is literally true that it will be only for a little while.

In this connection it is proper for the Senate to consider what marked deference, by way of construction, this body has always heretofore paid to the great fundamental provision of the Constitution upon this whole subject of amendment. The provision of the Constitution under which alone it can be amended reserves to each sovereign State the broadest possible control over the question of its representation in this body. Article V, which gives the entire power to amend, ends with this clause:

No State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

To what extreme length has this honorable body gone here-tofore in giving proper force to this portion of the Constitution of the country. We are all aware that on this subject of the appointment of temporary Senators to fill vacancies the old Con-We are all aware that on this subject of the stitution provided that the appointment should hold until the next meeting of the legislative body of the State. "The next meeting" are the words of the Constitution. Yet this body, in deference to the right of the State to be represented on this floor completely, by two Senators, has gone so far as to absolutely write into the Constitution that the Senators appointed shall hold not until the next meeting, but until the next legislature shall act or shall adjourn. They have extended the right or title to hold a seat, or whatever you may call it, of an appointed Senator one, two. three, four, or five months, as the case might be, absolutely in the teeth of the Constitution in this respect, by reason of deference to the great provision that no State could be deprived of its equal representation here without its consent.

Mr. President, the real point in the Alabama case, with all due respect to the learned debate that has proceeded here today and yesterday, it seems to me, is that the State of Alabama has not passed a general election without submitting this matter of the election of a Senator to the people of the State. The people of Alabama have never come together for the purpose of electing anybody since this vacancy occurred and since this constitutional amendment has been passed.

If that State, which has not ratified the seventeenth amendment, chooses to say it will not be fined, it will not be penalized, it will not be punished to the extent of $100,000, or whatever sum it may cost to call a special election, it seems to be well within the province or the rights of that State to take that position upon the subject.

Mr. President, briefly, in conclusion I wish to say that under all the circumstances of this case, in my best judgment, certainly Mr. Glass appears to have a color of right to a seat in this body and that the authorities of that State have not acted beyond their fair rights under the reservation of the Constitution.

Alabama did not ratify the seventeenth amendment. The people of Alabama have never gone to the polls themselves to ratify that amendment. So the State is within its right, in my humble judgment, and I believe it to be my duty here to-night to vote for the seating of Mr. Glass in this body.

In conclusion I will say only one word more, Mr. President, and that is this: That two Senators have come here elected or appointed in different ways. It would seem in this connection that there are two classes of Members here who should explain their positions.

There were 24 Senators in this body who by votes or by pairs expressed their opinion against a Senator sent here by the people of one State, and now there are many of them ready to vote against a man sent here by appointment from another State. They would appear unwilling to grant the right to a seat to either man, no matter how he may come here or what his pretensions to a seat may be. It would seem that this class of Senators should be called upon for an explanation to-day, and I feel also that a similar obligation of an explana-

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to debate this question, but simply explain my vote. It is always an unpleasant task for me to cast my vote against any person of high character and splendid ability, such as I understand Mr. GLASS to be. Furthermore, it is unpleasant, because he belongs to a party to which I do not belong. This, however, is a fundamental question. We have only recently voted to seat another Member and admitted him to membership in this great body based upon an entirely different provision of law. Senator Lee was permitted to a seat in this body because he was elected by the people under the provisions of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, I am not a lawyer, but in my humble way I helped to pass the constitutional amendment which provides that United States Senators shall be elected by the people and not chosen by the members of the legislature. To me it seems perfectly plain. Section 3 of Article I of the old Constitution provides:

SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

Further on, with reference to vacancies, it provides:

And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The new provision of the Constitution is:

ARTICLE XVII.

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

Now, with reference to vacancies, the old provision of the Constitution was changed, and now reads as follows:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may

Mr. President, I understand that the Legislature of the State of Alabama-or, in other words, the people of Alabama-have not authorized or empowered the governor of Alabama to make this appointment. It is perfectly clear to me that under the old constitution the governor of the State of Alabama would be empowered to appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy; but it is just as clear to me that the governor of Alabama has no right, has no authority, and has not been empowered by the people of Alabama or by its legislature to make that appointment. In both the cases which have been before the Senate the men who have been selected to occupy seats in this body are Democrats. I voted to seat Mr. Lee from the State of Maryland because the people of Maryland elected him to take his seat in this body; but I shall be compelled to vote against the admission of Mr. Glass, because I believe that he is not entitled to a seat in this body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson].

Infinite Spirit, Father of all souls, bestower of all gifts, we thank Thee for our homes, for our country, for our religion. CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BALTZ. Mr. Speaker, on December 18 I introduced a bill (H. R. 10942) providing for the furnishing of information as to the yield of grain in the United States and Territories, and for other purposes. This bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture by mistake, and I now ask unanimous consent to have it referred to the Committee on the Census.

The SPEAKER. What is the subject of the bill?

Mr. BALTZ. Providing for the furnishing of information as to the yield of grain in the United States and Territories, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Baltz] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10942, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask my colleague whether he has referred this matter to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever]?

Mr. BALTZ. I want to say to the gentleman that I did, and that it meets with his approval.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection,

THE TARIFF.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to consume three minutes by making a short statement

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick] asks unanimous consent for three minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House and the country to a letter which I received this morning in the mail from an ex-Republican in Connecticut. It

THOMAS W. HARDWICK, M. C. MIDDLETOWN, CONN., February 2, 1914.

DEAR SIR: As I was reading in our Connecticut papers a few weeks ago about one of your Members of Congress reading to Congress what effect the tariff had on the piano industry in Deep River, Conn., I have a few clippings more to digest. I wish I had saved more for you. Over in Groversdale, Conn., they have advanced the wages as good as 25 per cent. Two thousand hands will reap a reward because of tariff bill. Up in Webster, Mass., 1,000 hands have had their wages increased, Here is one factory controlled by ex-Congressman Hill, one of the calamity howlers, working night and day. No more voting Republican ticket for me. I think this Democratic Congress has done more good for the people than any Congress in years. What a fine President Wilson is making. He is not running all over the country, but he is right on the job. I hear people talk in the factory. I know the way they talk they admire the Democratic administration. Please do not give out my name as I work in a high-protection factory.

Yours, respectfully,

Also, I will insert the following clipping: EAGLE LOCK CO. RUSHING.

TERRYVILLE, CONN., January 31.

Announcement is made that because of an increase in business the Eagle Lock Co. in this town has begun to operate three departments of its screw-making factory on a 13-hour basis six days in the week. About 200 of the 1,400 employees are affected. Former Congressman E. J. Hill, who has had much to say about the evils that might be expected under the new tariff and currency bills, is said to be a considerable stockholder in the company of which R. J. Pumb is president.

This gentleman signs his name and gives his street and number. Gentlemen, this is but a sample of how much real calamity there is in the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]
Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for three minutes.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that the gentleman is in error. There are 2,000 hands in the Groversdale factory, instead of 200, that have been benefited.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to accept the amendment of my friend from Connecticut. It was a misreading.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] asks unanimous consent to ad-The House will be in order. The gentledress the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, like all information which comes from that side of the House, there are liable to be errors in the statements which are made. I have a letter here from ex-Congressman Hill in reference to this matter, which I put in my pocket to meet just this proposition, supposing some gentleman, in the exuberance of the moment, would refer to this proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MANN. If I have the time.

Mr. MANN.

Mr. HARDWICK. You can get the time, of course.

Mr. MANN. I will yield.
Mr. HARDWICK. Does it make any difference at all whether Mr. Hill is a stockholder in this factory or not, if wages have been increased to hundreds and thousands of hands?

Mr. MANN. It makes a difference whether the statement is true or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was printed in the press. Mr. MANN. I have an answer from Mr. Hill which answers one proposition there at least.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is an immaterial part.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman thinks it is immaterial if it does not interest his side. The gentleman from Georgia presents a letter saying that ex-Congressman Hill is interested in certain factories. I presume the rest of the article is just as reliable as that part of it. Mr. Hill says:

NORWALK, Conn., February 2, 1914.

Hon. James R. Mann.

My Dear Mann: The New York Times of February 2 has a dispatch from Hartford, doubtless intended to hit at "ex-Congressman Ebenezer J. Hill, a Payne Republican Ways and Means Committee member." It speaks of "his Terryville factory." and is headed "Overtime in Hill's factory—Mills rushed, despite owner's tariff pessimism." If occasion requires, you are authorized to say that I have no interest in any Terryville factory and never had, and am not now and never have been interested in any factory of any kind outside of the town in which I live. JAMES R. MANN.

interested in any factory of any live.

I know nothing about the other statements made in the dispatch, but if they are no more accurate than those concerning me they are of no value whatever,

Yours, truly,

E. J. Hill.

I presume the rest of the dispatch is equally inaccurate with this statement. I suggest to gentlemen that they verify some of the wild ideas that they exploit on the floor of the House before they make their statements.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. MANN.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman does not know that the facts stated by this man-who may not know about the ownership of the factory-as to the increase in wages and number of employees are not true?

Mr. MANN. I do not know, but I give very little credence to the statement of a man who is unwilling to have his name known

Mr. HARDWICK. I will give the gentleman his name if he

EXPENSES OF MINE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 395 (H. Rept. 217).

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the Committee on Mines and Mining or any subcommittee thereof, under House resolution 387, adopted January 27, 1914, authorizing said committee or subcommittee thereof to make certain investigations, to an amount not exceeding $15,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, on April 25, 1913, I introduced the bill H. R. 4310, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, although it is a private claim bill. It belongs to the Committee on Claims. In fact, I spoke about it to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, long ago, and he said it was a private claim bill and ought to be cognizable by the Committee on Claims. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Gold-FOGLE] asks that the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4310) concerning certain moneys collected from Bernard Citroen as customs duties and declared by the United States Supreme Court to have been illegally exacted, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Martin, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. DILLON, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6060, the immigration bill, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] will take the chair.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6060, the immigration bill, with Mr. Hay in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6060, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-

NETT] is recognized. Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment to section 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-NETT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 38, by striking out in lines 9, 11, and 20, respectively, the word "three" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it permissible to demand that that amendment be separated into its three component parts?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the committee by consent could adopt all three amendments at the same time.

Mr. GARDNER. I am against the committee amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Then—
Mr. GARDNER. I ask unanimous consent that these three amendments be considered separately.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] makes the point of order that the three amendments can not be offered at one and the same time, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to consider the first amendment separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to consider the first amendment. Without objection, the Clerk will report it

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 38, line 9, by striking out the word "three" and insert-g the word "five."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, section 19 reads, "That any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States in violation of law," and so forth. The committee thought that that was too short a time. The committee thought that there ought to be a deportation of these aliens after five years if they came in violation of law at any time within five years; and that is the substance of that amendment. The time now, under the existing law, is three years, and the committee thought it ought to be extended to five years.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.
Mr. SABATH. I have been present at all the meetings of the committee and I can not recollect when the committee has voted to increase the time from three years to five years. The chairman may be in a position to enlighten me as to when that was agreed upon.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; I will state to the gentleman that at one of our meetings the motion was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle]. The committee record shows and my memory corresponds to the record, that it was not agreed to that the word "three" was not stricken out and the word "five" was not inserted. The gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. SABATH] was present at that meeting.

At a subsequent meeting of the committee, at which the gentleman was not present, attention was called to the fact that that change was not made in the text of the bill, from three to five, and the statement was made by gentlemen from their recollection-and most of them agreed that that was the case, although my recollection did not agree with theirs-that we had at that meeting agreed to an extension to five years. In order to remedy that, so that there would be no conflict between the record and what gentlemen thought the committee actually did, a motion was made to instruct the chairman of the committee to offer this amendment. In conformity with that motion I have offered the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact the records of the committee show that these amendments were at first voted down.

The deportation clause of the immigration law is already severe. For instance, if a man comes into this country as a stowaway, or if he comes in as a vagrant, or if he comes in stowaway, or if he comes in as a vagrant, or if he comes in having his ticket paid for by an association or society, he is here illegally. But if he manages to satisfy the immigrant inspectors and is permitted to land in this country, nevertheless, no matter how good a citizen he may prove, in the next three years he is liable to deportation if the facts ever crop out. That is the law to-day, and I think it harsh enough. It subjects immigrants whose passage money has been paid by an association or society to the blackmail of the year people. association or society to the blackmail of the very people responsible for bringing them in. Now, it is proposed in this first amendment to extend that period to five years. This whole section of the existing law has been tremendously strengthened in this bill already, without the adoption of any one of those amendments.

As things are to-day, if a man comes into this country and afterwards becomes a criminal, he can not be deported. We tried to get bills through this House allowing him to be deported within three years. The House has always questioned whether a criminal ought to be deported for crimes committed in this country, because it is argued that those crimes may have been committed in consequence of conditions existing here. Nevertheless we have included in this bill this deportation provision for those who become criminals within three years after arrival. Now, the third amendment proposes to increase that period to five years. That is a pretty big jump from the present law, which does not permit a criminal to be deported at all unless he was a criminal before he came here.

Under existing law we can not deport people who become public charges after arrival here, unless they become public charges from conditions existing prior to landing. We make no change in that respect.

Under the present law prostitutes and procurers may be deported at any time during the rest of their lives, provided they are still aliens. In the law, as we propose it, we retain precisely the same feature.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the first amendment is far more objectionable than any of the rest. Perfectly innocent men get by the inspectors—they are vagrants, to be sure; they are liable to become public charges, to be sure; they may have some other disability, to be sure, like the loss of three fingers, which will endanger their ability to earn a living—

Mr. BURNETT. This does not apply to those who become public charges,

Mr. GARDNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will read the language

Mr. GARDNER. That language applies to those who be-ome public charges after entry. This amendment would affect come public charges after entry. This amendment would affect all who are here in violation of the law. If a man was likely to become a public charge when he came here he is here in violation of the law, and to-day is deportable at any time within three years. It is now proposed to make that period five years.

Many a good man who technically came here in violation of law has slipped by the inspectors; many a contract laborer, who did not know that he was a contract laborer; many a man who saw an advertisement in a foreign paper and thought it was proper for him to emigrate in response to that advertisement came here originally in violation of law. We now require such men to be deported if discovered within three years, but this amendment holds the sword of Damocles over them for five years

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment now pending?
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 38, line 9, by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "five."

Mr. MANN. Was not the committee amendment to this section agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not.

Mr. MANN. It is printed in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been offered by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. It need not be offered by the chairman of the committee; but, of course, it does not necessarily take prece-

The CHAIRMAN. In accordance with the practice of the House, the committee amendment in the bill will first be considered. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 10, after the word "law," insert the following:
"Any alien who within three years after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, or advocating or teaching anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of organized government or the assassination of public officials."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, before that is done this amendment making it five years instead of three years is really an amendment to the committee amendment, and I should think that ought to be voted on first to perfect the committee amend-

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment to the committee amendment, the gentleman will have to withdraw the amendment which he offered before.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered to the text and not to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. But that is the second amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The first amendment has not been adopted. The Charkman. The installment has not been adopted. The Chair inadvertently failed to have reported the committee amendment printed in the bill. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Alabama withdraws the first amendment he offered and offers another to the committee amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the Chair is misled, and that this is an amendment to the text and not to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. MOORE. If this amendment is adopted, there will still be an opportunity to offer amendments to this committee

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman desires to amend the committee amendment it is now in order to offer an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Alabama has offered one amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. There is an amendment to perfect line 9, page 38, of the text of the bill, and I raise the point of order that an amendment can not be withdrawn in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the committee amendment ought to have been placed before the committee before any other amendment was offered. It was not in order to offer that amendment until the committee amendment had been acted upon.

Mr. GARDNER. If the Chair rules that way, very well. I know of no rule of the House that requires the committee amendment to take precedence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is the order of busi-The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, which the Clerk will

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARDNER. Another question, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GARDNER. The result is that we are going to consider this paragraph wrong end to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know about that. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 11, after the word "who," strike out the words "within three years" and insert the words "at any time."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, is that debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly it is.
Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the committee amendment purposes to deal wholly with anarchists and those teaching the destruction of life and property and the overthrow of government. I assume none of us has any sympathy with any of these classes. The Commissioner General of Immigration in the report referred to yesterday asked that his jurisdiction in this matter be enlarged to a certain extent. It seems to me-and I believe most of the committee feel this way about it—that we ought to have a very positive law with regard to anarchists and to those who unlawfully teach the destruction of life and property. believe there is no real division in the committee on that question. My amendment purposes to leave it in the power of the Secretary of Labor to seize a criminal alien at any time, if he is still an alien, when found unlawfully teaching the destruction of life and property or the overthrow of our Government. There ought to be no excuse for the criminal alien who has not become a citizen of the United States to teach the destruction of life and property. There ought to be no limitation on the power of the Secretary in this regard. There ought to be no expense incurred in any community to maintain and try the man, who, refusing to comply with the requirements of citizenship and being an alien, unlawfully teaches the destruction of life and property. Such a man under this amendment might be seized at any time by the Secretary of Labor and deported to the place whence he came.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MOORE. Yes.
Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman inform me how he construes the latter part of the amendment which states "or the overthrow by force or violence of organized government ?? Does that include any organized government, or only our own Government?

Mr. MOORE. I would amend that and make it the Government of the United States. We are not dealing with patriots.

Mr. SABATH. I think that amendment ought to be made. Mr. MOORE. I would be very glad to offer such an amend-

Mr. MOORE. We ought not to sanction on the highways or amongst the people of the United States alien anarchists who mislead workingmen, or who mislead other aliens by teaching the uniawful destruction of life and property in this country, and so far as the members of the minority on the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization are concerned I do not know one of them who does not stand for a law that will embody that principle.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SLAYDEN.

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. If there is a proper and efficient administration, he ought not to come into the country at all, and he would not. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man comes here with a family having a boy or a girl six months or a year old. The father does not take out naturalization papers. The boy is educated and the girl is educated in this country. Does the gentleman think that at the end of 18 or 20 years that boy or girl, who is still an alien, should be seized and sent back to some country, which country does not want to take either of them?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman presents an extreme case; but if anyone turns criminal and unlawfully preaches in America the destruction of life and property here, there ought to be no hesitancy about apprehending or turning him back, no matter what the length of his residence. We do not need men in this country to teach destruction of life and property. is contrary to our institutions. I have opposed this bill because it bars unfortunate men and women who can not read, whose intentions are pure and lawful, but I do not believe that we need in this country or should tolerate here men who come under subterfuge or otherwise to teach the destruction of life and property and to disturb our peace.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what would be the situation if an honest-hearted man should come into this country and be educated under our law, and under American tuition should become an anarchist. Would the gentleman then attempt to send him back to the country whence he came-an anarchist who was made so under American tuition?

Mr. MOORE. I have not heard of anything of that kind, and sounds like a far-fetched proposition.

The time of the gentleman from Pennsyl-The CHAIRMAN. vania has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the original intention of the committee, as I gather it, seemed to be, with no dispute or division, that this should be five years, because it was supposed that a man having lived here five years would then be able to become a citizen by naturalization, if he had taken out his first papers in time, and then followed that up by making his final application, which can all be done after five years from his landing. We ought to have the right to make him stay here the length of time that it requires him to become a citizen, and if he violates the law and does any of these things provided for in this section he ought to be deported. Anyone who teaches the unlawful destruction of property or advocates or teaches anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of organized government, or the assassination of public officials, who has lived here five years and does not desire to become a citizen, and then lives here another two years and makes no application to become a citizen, and teaches the assassination of public officials or the unlawful destruction of property or the overthrow of government, he does not belong in America. And in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, if a child comes here with his parents at the age of 3 or 5 years and stayed here 15 years and was so inculcated with all things of this Government that he then taught anarchy and assassination of public officials or the destruction and overthrow of government, he does not belong in America and he ought to be sent Lack to the country from which he came; but the amendment of the committee will sufficiently cover the question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the country from which he came refuses to receive one so imbued with the principles of anarchy? How are we going to force him back?

Mr. RAKER. That does not require an answer; the statement answers itself. Under the principles of living as taught in our common schools that condition should never obtain

Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not at this time. This ought to be amended where it says "or the overthrow by force or violence of organized government." I do not believe this country ought to permit aliens to come in here and live here and establish schools for the purpose of overthrowing this Government. Our schools ought to be established for the betterment of this Government, for the purpose of trying to build up this Government, trying to teach its principles, trying to teach its laws, so that they can make better citizens and assist those surrounding them instead of starting a propaganda, sowing the seeds of discord, and disseminating dissatisfaction and assassination, so that it may be promulgated all over this country. That man does not belong in America; he does not belong here; his place is somewhere else, who tenches or advocates the doctrines as prohibited by this section. That man ought not to be allowed to come here and teach the destruction of this Government. He ought to be taught that it is our highest object and our purpose to teach the power of the individual to properly control him-self and be a good citizen, that he might better himself and those who surround him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to say that I am opposed to the amendment offered by my colleague of the committee [Mr. Moore] and in favor of the committee amendment and the amended paragraph, which provides, in line 11, page 38, that "three years" shall be changed to "five years." I regret, Mr. Chairman, that there seems to have been a slight misunderstanding as to the committee's action, but I believe that all the members of the Committee on Immigration desire to indorse the great work that has been done by the chairman [Mr. Bur-NETT] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] in perfecting the details of this exceedingly difficult bill.

Now, should this line be changed to read "deportation at any that change will interfere with the wording of the bill in many places which we have passed. If I may be permitted to speak for a moment of the committee's action, let me say that this amendment was considered with considerable care and it was decided to make the time of deportation five years in the one place, line 11; that any alien, during the five-year period, in which time he should learn to regard citizenship of the United States as a privilege, should be deported if he commits or advocates the unlawful destruction of property or the overthrow by force of this Government.

Mr. Chairman, that clause should have been adopted 30 years ago. I contend that we must do more than simply put up the bars against undesirable immigration. By this clause we put aliens on probation and withhold their right to live in the United States unless they show at least passive love and respect for it and its institutions. It is not fair that along with aliens who come here to make homes, to live in and love the United States, shall come those who neither respect our flag nor our institutions and who bring with them a mass of "isms" which if not checked, must lead on to anarchy and revolution.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to show here a copy of a newspaper which came in my mail this very morning. This is a Tacoma newspaper containing a photograph of a letter threatening the life of one of the city officials of Tacoma. It is signed by some member of one of those revolutionary organizations which contend for direct action, the overthrow of this Government, and the unlawful destruction of property—sabotage, if you please.

Will my colleague yield there? Mr. RAKER. Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Gladly.

Mr. RAKER. Now, if that man had been in the United States six years and threatened the life of this official, ought he not to be sent away

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not agree with the

Mr. BARTON. Why? Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He should, as a matter of fact, be sent away, but I think if in five years we can not teach the thousands who come, and during that five years prepare them for citizenship, we will just have to fight it out with them. I am in favor of the committee amendment as reported by the unanimous vote of those who were present.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, no one has more earnestly or persistently opposed the literacy test in this immigration bill than I have. I believe the injection of that provision means the exclusion of many decent, honest, industrious, and law-abiding persons simply because an opportunity to acquire an education was denied them. But we are now met with a proposition offered by the Immigration Committee to change the period of limitation of three years, as it is in existing law, to five years, so that within the latter period of time those who teach the doctrine of anarchy or the assassination of public officials may be deported. I want my country kept clear of men who advocate the assassination of public officials. I want my country kept clear of men who sow the seed of discord and discontent against our American Government or dare preach the doctrines of anarchy. [Applause.]

With characters of that kind I have no sympathy, so, Mr. Chairman, I see no harm in the adoption of the committee amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. Chairman, I will not go as far as my colleague on the committee [Mr. Moore] has gone in his amendment. I can not go to the length he desires without fixing a limit of time. think it is not unreasonable to change the period in existing law from three years to five years. It merely extends it two years. If the committee amendment is adopted, it will enable the Department of Labor to discover those who preach and advocate doctrines that menace the peace and happiness, the well-being and welfare of America, as was suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. Raker].

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. With pleasure.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Does not the gentleman think it ought to be amended so as to read, "the organized Government of the United States"? Do you think it is a crime for any man to say that he would like to see a despotism overthrown by force? Was not the despotism of the English Government overthrown by force by the attitude and the cooperation of the American Colonies?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Rhode Island is right in the enunciation of the principle he has expressed and I agree with him fully, but the gentleman has not read the lan-guage of the bill in so far as it is affected by the amendment offered by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MANAHAN] is recognized.

Mr. CARDNER Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr.

MANAHAN] is recognized.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Manahan] yield half a minute to me?

Mr. MANAHAN. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I would like to have this amendment read for the information of the committee. This provides we can not deport people whom we do not exclude, and this will make the amendment uniform.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the amendment be again read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 14, strike out the words "organized government" and insert "the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, it is page 38. The gentleman should have it go in that way. He said "page 32," but it should be page 38, should it not?

The CHAIRMAN. It is page 38 of the bill. Mr. DYER. The Clerk read "page 32."

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I had it in mind to speak on that very point, and I only want to say now that, before that amendment was offered, the proposition was manifestly unfair. I think it would be nothing short of a repudiation of our whole history as a Nation if we undertook to deport every man who had taught, or was teaching, or believed in, the overthrow of some foreign despotism. And I am in favor of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] just now.

I also wish to suggest that I think the amendment as it stands is in very much better condition than it will be if the amendment of my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] is adopted, and for a good many reasons. I think the three-year limitation is a fair limitation to make, and to assume that we can not control people living within our borders after they have been with us three years is a sort of confession of weakness,

If any man commits a crime here, we should be capable of promptly and properly taking care of him and punishing him for the crime.

The way this amendment reads at present it would make it possible for this Government to deport the suffragettes of England if they came over here. It would be better to reform them. It is an unfair amendment in that it combines offenses like unrestrained anarchy, that cry to Heaven for vengeance, with offenses such as those with which some of the best women of England are charged. I think we ought not to pass a law here which classes with anarchists a woman, a respectable, decent woman, who, through mistaken judgment, takes the position of the suffragettes of England—who honestly feel that they are justified in destroying the mail, for instance, for the sake of securing to themselves rights which every honest man must concede are very sacred rights, and the denial of which is a reflection upon their Government.

Now, in case women of that kind should be here, or should come here and, after living here for a time, should feel keenly we are not treating them right as women, and, through mistaken judgment, take that point of view and get doing what they should not, I think it is hardly commendable to our civilization to say that instead of punishing them for violence they should be ranked with anarchists, who believe in destroying and murdering all governors and Presidents, and so forth, and be deported as such. I think it is such an unbalanced amendment that it ought to be adjusted in some way and so changed as that at any time not the milder offender but the grave offender should be subject to deportation.

It is a confession of weakness on the part of our Government that we can not keep and control them, which, for my part, I am ashamed to make. We ought to be able so to administer our laws as to compel obedience thereto. Deportation is a confession that we can not handle the person deported; and when we say we can not handle well-meaning but misguided women like the suffragettes of England we confess to a failure on the part of our Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, referring not to the question of anarchy or assassination of public officials or to those who are against all government, but to this portion of the amendment which reads "advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property," I want to say that that is a very broadly stated proposition.

It is only necessary, prior to five years' residence, to teach unlawful destruction of property in order to become subject to deportation. Up in Alaska nearly a year ago some well-meaning citizens were offended at the policy of the department with reference to the opening of the coal lands, and there went up there a shipload of coal, and some of those people met at the wharf and, as I understand, threw a lot of the coal into the bay. They were unlawfully destroying property, and if it had hap-pened that among those men—who were well purposed and had grievances, and against whom I am not making any criticismthere was one man who was an alien, or was the son of an unnaturalized citizen, or of some one who had not acquired a citizenship under the special laws applicable, he would be subject to deportation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. BRYAN. I will; but make it very brief.
Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to ask my colleague if he believes in the teachings or practice of sabotage as brought into this country?

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman knows that I do not believe in that that question should not be that doctrine; and he knows that that question should not be asked here and is not appropriate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the crux of the whole matter. I ask the gentleman again If he believes in the unlawful destruction of property?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not believe in the unlawful destruction of property or in anything else that is unlawful, and the gentleman knows that. I think a question of that kind is an insult. When you go to make a law and say that anything is unlawful, and leave it to the Commissioner of Immigration to determine whether or not a given act is unlawful, you give him

In Alaska it is said that the Guggenheims employed some gunmen on a certain occasion to stop the building of a railroad, and they engaged in some things of that kind. In every new country and in every new development there are strikes and differences of opinion among men, and some men may destroy a little property or something—a scuttle or two of coal or a dollar's worth of property—and then they become subject to this provision, because it is construed that they teach the unlawful destruction of property. I say that is too broad a provision. It is all right to expel from this country at every opportunity an anarchist or any man who tries to overthrow the Government.

Of course I accord with the amendment that has been suggested with reference to violence against our own organized Government, and I do not desire to open up the matter as to those particulars at all; but as to this other, I am opposed to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I believe those words ought to be cut out.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the gallantry of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Manahan] is running away with his judgment. I think that criminals ought to be denied admission to the United States under all circumstances. If we are able to fix upon women the participation in a conspiracy or the giving of advice that induced crime they ought to be kept out. Arson is just as effective when committed by women as when committed by men, and on many historic occasions, as gentlemen know, property has been destroyed by women.

Mr. MANAHAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will be quick about it.
Mr. MANAHAN. Is there any difference between destroying property for political rights now and the destroying of property at the Boston tea party?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman opens up a very wide avenue of discussion, which I have not the time in five minutes to go into; but unquestionably the very people for whom in his gallentry be speaks on this case of the control of the c whom in his gallantry he speaks on this occasion have been guilty of inexcusable crimes, the destruction of historic buildings, and of efforts to destroy libraries and public galleries, all of which were established and maintained for the benefit and education of the public.

I abhor anarchy so much that my sympathy inclines me to support all these measures which tend to keep them out. I shall vote for the committee amendment of five years, but I am also inclined to believe that if I had the power to do so I would apply the method lately announced by one of those disciples of pure democracy in Mexico, Mr. Emiliano Zapata, who says that when he gets to the City of Mexico he is going to hang Huerta and Blanquet from the balconies of the palace, and then he is going to try them and have them shot. Now, I would execute these anarchists if I could, and then I would deport them, so that the soll of our country might not be polluted by their pres-ence even after the breath had gone out of their bodies. [Applause.] I do not care what the time limit is, whether it is forever, as advocated by my friend and colleague on the comforever, as advected by my Iriend and coneague on the committee [Mr. Moone], or whether it is fixed at what the committee thought a reasonable limit. What I want to do is to shut out anarchy and anarchists, and if they get in and we find them out, I want to get rid of them by some route, whether it be a trans-Atlantic or trans-Pacific steamer, or by execution by the hangman. It makes no difference to me, so that we get rid of them, and I have no sympathy with crime, no matter what cause it may be in support of or by what sex committed. I oppose it under all circumstances.

Mr. DONOHOE. Would the gentleman have been willing to deport Louis Kossuth, the Hungarian patriot, or the men who came to this country advocating freedom for Cuba?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have never put broad revolutionary movements in support of human rights, certainly not those like that for which Robert Emmet was executed, on a par with the common crimes of anarchy and arson. [Applause.]

with the common crimes of anarchy and arson. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOHOE. But those gentlemen meant the overthrow of the despotisms against which they were fighting.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, the acute intellect of my friend will have no difficulty in distinguishing the difference between broad revolutionary movements and the individual acts of criminals, which not only do not advance the cause they purport to be aiding but actually have a tendency to retard their progress. [Applause]

[Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, our Democratic friends, having decided last night that they would not appoint a committee in the House on the woman-suffrage question, now propose to adopt an amendment under which if some woman comes to this country from England who has been advocating the policy of the suffragettes in England shall be deported for three or five years, or as long as she lives. They are very bold after the caucus last night; but up until the meeting of the caucus it was impossible to get any expression or opinion from any gentleman on that side of the House, with the exception of our handsome friend from Alabama, who does not himself consider that his good looks gives him immunity from female [Laughter.]

But this morning we are very bold. It is proposed now to shut out or deport for years to come anyone for political offenses. I have wondered what distinction our friends from the South on the Democratic side make between advocating destruction of property and advocating destruction of human life contrary to

Suppose an amendment should be proposed here permitting the deportation of an alien or the punishment of an American who not only advocates but who follows up his advocacy of the destruction of human life contrary to law. There are a the destruction of human life contrary to law. There are a number of gentlemen on the floor of this Chamber who would probably be deported or punished, because I have frequently heard-them assert that it was the policy of the people in the South to punish without regard to the processes of law certain offenses under certain conditions. Will you advocate a proposition that puts property above life? You propose to provide for the deportation forever of some who, in a political excitement or following a political propaganda, advocates the destruction of property, but you condone the offense of those who advocate the destruction of human life. I leave it to our friends to decide

Mr. GARDNER. Before the gentleman sits down I want to ask him a question. The gentleman has not overlooked the fact that we have already adopted section 3 of this bill which excludes those who advocate teaching unlawful destruction of property? His reasoning would equally apply to their exclu-

Mr. MANN. Not necessarily. Here is a proposition pending before the House to deport them and order their deportation for life, and I believe the law provides now against the admission of people who advocate the destruction of organized government. Although, when the question was recently brought before the administration in the concrete instead of the abstract, they permitted the admission, and I think rightly so, stract, they permitted the admission, and I think rightly so, of a lady of renown from England.

Mr. GARDNER. I want to call attention to the fact—and I am not opposing the gentleman's view—I want to call his attention to the fact that the committee is trying to make the deportation paragraph conform with the exclusion paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I should say not. There is quite a distinction between somehody coming here advocating the destruction of property and some one coming here advocating the destruction of life.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], without the slightest occasion or excuse, has injected into this debate a bitter criticism on the conduct of some of the people of the South with regard to punishment imposed of the people of the South with regard to punishment imposed for certain crimes. I want to say in reply to the gentleman that last year a Republican United States Senator from a Northern State said in a speech:

All this talk about the South lynching negroes for the commission of that most helnous offense against woman should cease. The fact is the northern man lynches for that offense just like the southern man does.

Mr. Chairman, it would be much more appropriate if the gentleman from Illinois would speak against the awful crime that causes lynching rather than to criticize the action of the enraged and unfortunate men whose loved ones have been outraged and whose peace of mind and happiness have been destroyed.

We of the South want the crime that makes lynching possible We want the law to take its course, but I can not to cease. tell, and the gentleman from Illinois can not tell, just exactly what the men of the South or the men of the North will do when the horrifying and heart-rending news of rape reaches them. The situation is desperate then, and they often do desperate things. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that that outrageous and unnamable offense against woman is committed in the North as well as in the South, and the wrath of the northern man expresses itself in about the same form that it does in the southern man. In the last two or three years white men in Northern States have lynched negroes who committed the crime of rape. In some instances they applied the torch and burned the criminal at the stake. Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is best that the law be allowed to take its course, but who can tell the precise action that men will take and who can describe their feeling when the news that the wife or daughter of a neighbor has been assaulted by some fiendish brute in human form? Excitement reigns and men are desperate. Let me say in this connection to the gentleman from Illinois, it will be a sorry day and a lamentable time when the men of the North or the men of the South receive with indifference and unconcern the news of that awful crime against woman. [Ap-

Southern womanhood is the priceless jewel of the southern household, and we will safeguard it and protect it with the last drop of our blood. [Applause.] The importance and necessity for the safety of our women and the sanctity of the home are the same the country over, and the curse of God Almighty will rest upon the man who will not protect and defend them. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is rec-

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] a question within his time.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Alabama is not in possession of the floor. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. CARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts reserved the right in committee to oppose the sections excluding and deporting persons who teach the unlawful destruction of property. I did not do so entirely for the reasons suggested by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]; but I think that a good deal of what he has said is so and a good deal of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said is so. However, Mr. Chairman, I did not avail myself of my right to dissent when section 3 was reached. I did not offer an amendment. Perhaps by my silence I acquiesced in excluding the admission of people who teach the unlawful destruction of property. That being the case, I hesitate to oppose their deportation, but I certainly think that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] should not prevail. I believe the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and other gentlemen are absolutely correct in saying that the wording of this committee amendment must be changed. The amendment as it reads now would require the deportation of any man who advocates the overthrow by force or violence of organized government. Undoubtedly, as some gentleman suggested, such a provision of law would have required the deportation of Kossuth, the Hungarian, or of Quesada, the agent for the Cuban Junta.

Chairman, the amendment which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] will offer puts the matter in the proper shape. It will harmonize this section vith section 3. Section 3 provides for the exclusion from the United States of aliens who advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law. If that amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island is adopted, this part of the committee amendment will be corrected. If it is desired not to deport those who advocate the destruction of property, that end can be obtained by striking out line 12.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. In a moment. If it is desired to make the deportation period for anarchists five years instead of three, I shall not oppose the change any further, though I shall vote against it. The real hardship proposed is the change of the word "three" to "five," in line 9, and not the change of the word "three" to "five," in line 11. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to find myself in harmony with the gentleman from Massachusetts for once.

Mr. GARDNER. For the first time, I think, on this immigration question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does the gentleman believe that teaching the unlawful destruction of property will include the greater offense, namely, the destruction of property itself? For instance, I am thinking of the case of strikes, where laboring men may throw stones and break windows. That would be destructive. tion of property, and could they be deported under this section?
Mr. GARDNER. No. indeed, they could not.
Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman interpret the argument of the gentleman from Illinois as being in favor of the patriot rather than the criminal? My amendment contemplated dealing only with the criminal, and not with the patriot advocating the liberation of a country.

Mr. GARDNER. If the provision which reads "advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property" were stricken out of the committee amendment, and if the change suggested by the gentleman from Rhode Island is included, I should not have so much objection to a longer period during which deportation might be possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority, frequently gives credit where there is no credit due. If there is any credit due for this provision, it belongs to a gentleman on his side, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore]. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] did intend to secure the adoption of an amendment to which all, or nearly all, of the members of the committee have which an, or hearly an, or the members of the committee in averagreed, but I am of the opinion that he was very unfortunate in framing it. As it reads now, there is no doubt in my mind that the amendment, if adopted, would exclude a great many people whom we do not desire to deport. It would exclude patriots, who, persecuted and oppressed in other lands, come into our midst and seek our sympathy and our aid in their fight for political and religious liberty, and it would exclude those others who have falled to secure relief from the tyrannical oppression in their native country and who seek safety and shelter in this land of freedom.

As I have stated, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that we should deny these people admission to our shores, and therefore I have called the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the wording of this paragraph. I am of the opinion that if the gentleman from Rhode Island will introduce the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts—an amendment which was first proposed by me—and it is adopted, we will then accomplish everything that he gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] had in mind when he offered his amendment.

I wish to say that no one on this committee is in favor of permitting the anarchist or the criminal to remain in our midst, and it has been the aim of every member of the committee to secure the passage of a provision which will not only provide for their deportation if once they secure admission but which will prevent them from entering. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. The language of the committee's paragraph was not my language, although it was framed partly upon my suggestion; but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is nothing in the language of the committee amendment that does not contemplate deportation for unlawful acts, criminal acts, unpatriotic acts-acts that in themselves are criminal, for which, of course, the committee and the House would not stand.

Mr. SABATH. The provision under discussion now reads as follows:

That any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States in violation of law; any alien who within three years after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, or advocating or teaching anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of organized government or the assassination of public officials; any alien who within three years after entry becomes a public charge from causes existing prior to the landing, except as hereinafter provided; any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude committed within three years after the entry of the alien to the United States, * * shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported. * * *

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this proviso could easily be construed as affecting an alien advocating the overthrow of any organized government.

Mr. MOORE. I have said to the gentleman that that ought to pertain to the United States Government.

Mr. SABATH. Your amendment provides that-

Any allen who within three years after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, or advocating anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of organized government, or the assassination of public officials—shall be deported; and I have suggested that the words "of the organized Government of the United States" be inserted in place of "organized government," so that this provision will not apply to those whom we do not want affected by it.

That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. SABATH. And I am of the opinion that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Rhode Island will accomplish the desired result.

Mr. Chairman, there are efforts being made to amend two other provisions of this section-those with reference to the deportation of an alien who may become a public charge and the deportation of an alien who may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more for the commission of a crime after the entry of the alien to the United States. As the bill now reads, it provides for the deportation of any alien who within three years after entry becomes a public charge from causes existing prior to the landing. It has been proposed to increase this length of time to five years. This, in my opinion, is entirely unnecessary, as I am convinced that should an alien become a public charge after he had been in this country for over three years his condition could hardly be traced to causes existing prior to his landing and it would be manifestly unfair to extend this time for two more years.

In connection with the proposal to amend the bill so that any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime committed within five years after the entry of the allen to the United States, instead of three years, as the bill now reads, I wish to insert extracts from a speech which I delivered on the floor of this House some five years ago when there was under consideration a similar measure. At that time I said:

On its face there is nothing alarming about this measure, yet it comes dangerously near being a "wolf in sheep's clothing," for the reason that its full import is not recognized.

In order that I may not be misunderstood, I want to impress upon you from the very outset that I am unalterably opposed to the condoning of any offenses, for I hold that all transgressors, whether rich or poor, high or low, should have such lawful punishment meted out to them as is commensurate with their evil doings. Much, however, as I am opposed to any disregard of our laws, I am equally opposed to any and all unjust and unfair laws, and to cruel, inhuman, and barbarous pensities. Far be it from me to set myself in opposition to any law conducive to the betterment of conditions or to the preservation of the safety of the people of the United States, but I will not remain silent when I apprehend that safety to be endangered by ill-advised legislation.

Continuing, I said:

Continuing, I said:

Have you considered the cruelty of the punishment which would be inflicted upon the alien by the terms of this measure? Have you considered the case of an alien, perhaps a sober, industrious workingman, just recovering from the ravages of some disease? His savings from his hard-earned wages have become exhausted, his credit is cut off; misery knocks at his door; there is no way to provide even the bare necessities of life for his family, which finds itself on the verge of starvation. Such a man, we will say, strays from the righteous path, he is convicted, sentenced, sent to prison. The family is fatherless and without a provider. In the midst of all the trials and tribulations to which it is subjected it struggles along bravely, hoping for the day that the husband and father will return to assume his place at its head. Eagerly, anxiously, impatiently do his wife and children bide the time when the prison doors shall open for him. At last the day comes when the term of his imprisonment has expired, the day to which he and his loved ones have looked forward for months, perhaps years. Behond, the law steps in and tells him that he is a felon; that he must be deported; that the law will tear him away from wife and children, leaving them to the mercies of a rude world. Can you imagine the heart-rending scene which then ensues? The State erects a barrier between him and those nearest and dearest to him. What is to become of them? Friendless, the wife and children of a felon—a felon by the force of our unfair and unequal law, shunned by neighbors, unable to obtain work, destitution staring them in the face. Who will provide for them? Who will so shape their affairs for them that the children may have the advantage of an education and grow up to become good citizens?

We cry out against pauperism. We bring to bear all the ingenuity of philanthropy to lessen its evils and to deplete its army. Yet, in the instance I have cited, we make paupers of a family and surrender them without regard or compass

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish to quote the final words of the speech which I delivered at the time this other measure was under consideration and which apply with equal weight to the proposed amendment which I am now discussing:

Let us have laws that are humane, just, and fair. Let us not lay too heavy a hand upon an erring fellow being who, perhaps, through want and misery, is driven to the commission of a crime. [Applause.] In behalf of the thousands upon thousands of honest, upright, industrious, liberty-loving, and self-reliant people who flee from lands of bigotry, oppression, and tyranny to make their homes in this country I pray you to lay aside all prejudices which might prevent you from dealing with these people as you would be dealt by, and which might prevent you from being governed by the principles of fairness, justice, and humanity. [Long and continued applause.]

Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of this House, I trust you will defeat this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I desire to ask——
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has been cognized.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the committee amendment goes far enough with the amendment suggested by Judge Sabath and incorporated in the amendment that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] will introduce and offer. I think it goes far enough, for this reasonthe reason suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota: That if these people have been here for five years and have been good during that time, that it would perhaps be harsh and un-reasonable simply because after that time they began to preach or teach the destruction of property, for we have laws of all the States that are sufficient to deal with them if they become anarchists. If they have been here that length of time, the assumption is that they have learned the doctrines of anarchy here, either from their people who are here or from association after they come here. Therefore it strikes me it would be rather harsh and unreasonable to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman has referred to the fact it will perhaps keep out some of the militant suffragettes from England. Mr. Chairman, if they teach the destruction of property, they ought to be kept out. Be it said, while I do not agree with my suffragette friends in our country, and was one of those last night who voted against the adoption of a rule giving them a committee-but be it said to their credit, Mr. Chairman, that when Mrs. Pankhurst came over here, it being known that on the other side she was teaching the principles and doctrines of the destruction of property, that the splendid women of America who believed in woman suffrage did not meet her with open arms and give her the welcome that they would have given her if she had come teaching doctrines which the good women all over this country approve.

I want to say just one word in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority. After the magnificent patriotic speech that that gentleman made yesterday, showing a heart and a mind that was willing to embrace all of this country with all its patriotic inspirations, I was surprised when he made the attack upon the South, your country and my country, Mr. Chairman, that he did. If the North was immune to the attack which is made upon my people of the South in regard to lynchings, then there might be some reason for it; but, Mr. Chairman, you know and gentlemen in this House know whenever a black brute attacks a white woman, North or South, that he usually meets with the same fate. am not here to defend it, Mr. Chairman. In connection with some of the gentlemen in my home town I prevented a mob once from committing violence upon a negro guilty of one of the most heinious assaults upon a white widow woman in the suburbs of my town. I have never contended for mob iaw. I have always believed in letting the law take its course and justice be vindicated. But when a gentleman undertakes to point the finger of scorn at the South and say you and you alone are guilty of lynching I point him to the people of Cairo, Ill., the gentleman's own State; to the people of Wilmington, Del., where the grand jury even refused to return a true verdict, because, they said, that the sentiment of the community approved of it.

And I refer to a case which occurred in Denver, Colo., a few years ago, and to a case which occurred in the district of one of my splendid friends on this floor from Pennsylvania, where not only was a negro killed but was burned afterwards.

Mr. Chairman, if we take these matters into our own homes, we do not wonder that men, under impulses of that kind, with the feeling that their homes have been outraged or the virtue of their women has been desecrated, should take the law into their own hands and punish the guilty, whether the crime oc-curs in the North or in the South. Even at Springfield, Ill., under the shadow of the home of Lincoln, the same thing happens that sometimes happens in the South.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate be now closed on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bus-NETT] asks unanimous consent that the debate be now closed on the pending amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Len-ROOT] asks unanimous consent that the debate close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments that have not been discussed on two portions of this Will I have the privilege of speaking to the

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have the opportunity to offer the amendments, but he will not have an opportunity to debate them.

Mr. BURNETT. I refer to my amendment and to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that debate on the pending amendment be closed in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lennoot] is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on that part of the amendment relating to advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property. It is admitted that this amendment is aimed at the militant English suffragette. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] commented upon the fact that last night a caucus of the Democratic Party was held in this Chamber upon that question.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. Mr. GARDNER. I d I do not think it is admitted that it is almed at the militant suffragette,
Mr. LENROOT. I will modify that. I should say militant suffragettes who advocate unlawful destruction of property. Mr. GARDNER. I do not think so. I do not think that is fair. I was against it, and I do not think it is a fair statement. Mr. LENROOT. I will modify it by saying that, at least, they are one of the classes that will be included in this amendment, which is all I care about in the point I desire to make.

Now, Mr. Chairman, up to yesterday this matter of equal suffrage in the United States and equal suffrage in England were two entirely distinct questions. In this country, whether equal suffrage was a right or whether it was a matter of expediency, was one on which there was honest difference of opinion. But the Democratic Party last night by its action put this question on the same plane that it now occupies in England, for you gentlemen by your caucus last night undertook to say that suffragists shall not have an opportunity to be heard | has just completed, that the great Committee on the Judiciary before a committee of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] And that is what the militant suffragettes of England complain of, namely, not having the right to be heard. And you, the party in power in this country to-day, have now assumed as a party the responsibility of saying that they shall not have the right to be heard in the United States.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LENROOT. I have not time to yield.
Now, in view of that situation, existing since last night, Mr. Chairman, this amendment becomes doubly important. I believe in woman suffrage, but I believe the destruction of property, such as is advocated by some in England, if it should be followed up in this country, would delay woman suffrage 25 years here, and I do not want to see any such condition prevailing in the United States as prevails in England. I do not want to see anyone coming into this country advocating destruction of property here as it is being advocated in England. And so I am most heartily in favor of this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore].

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 14, strike out the words "organized government" and serf the words "the Government of the United States or of all forms

Mr. BURNETT. That is satisfactory, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that all debate on the pending amendment is now,

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood otherwise. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] may have five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, Mr. Chairman; I do not wish that, I now understand that debate is closed on the pending amend-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman— Mr. LINTHICUM. Has unanimous consent been granted, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized on this amendment. He is recognized in his own right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I was amazed at the statement that has just been made by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENBOOT], when he went out of his way to say that the action of the Democratic Party last night was intended to prevent the women of this country from being heard on the question as to whether the Constitution of the United States shall be amended or not, so as to grant woman suffrage.

My distinguished friend from Wisconsin is one of the ablest and most learned men in this House, and he knew as well as you and I knew, when he made the partisan address that he of this House has been vested for many years with jurisdiction over this very question; that it has repeatedly granted hearings to the women of the United States on the question as to whether or not legislation shall be passed submitting to the States a constitutional amendment for woman suffrage. During the many years that the gentleman's party was in power the same rules in this House existed as exist to-day. As a matter of fact, at one time I was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary myself, and I have had the pleasure of listening to the able arguments of Miss Susan B. Anthony before that committee. I have heard at different times the cause of woman suffrage advocated before the committee when the gen-tleman's party was in power, and I noticed through that entire series of years that the gentleman's party continually refused to report the resolution that these ladies desired.

Now, the proposition that came before the Democratic caucus last night was merely, in the first place, to provide for a new committee, to give jurisdiction to a new committee-a jurisdiction that was already possessed by one of the ablest committees of this House, which has had jurisdiction of that question almost since the beginning of the Government. There is no objection on the part of these ladies as to what committee they shall go before. They wanted their resolution reported, and shall go before. They wanted their resolution reported, and they thought they could not get it reported from the committee having the matter in charge and wanted to create a new committee to report it. That was all. It was not a question of taking away from them any constitutional right to be heard. It was merely the fact that they recognized that this House would not pass a resolution of that kind.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY and Mr. LENROOT rose.
The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman, as leader of the majority, use his influence in the House to report that resolution so that we may have an opportunity to vote on it?

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I will not yield. I want to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin. This controversy is between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself, and I ask other gentlemen, with all due courtesy, not to inject themselves into it. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I would not, because I am not in favor of it. If there is one fundamental principle that my party stands for, it is local self-government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the Democratic Party stands for one thing above all others, in reference to local selfgovernment, it is that the right of franchise should be governed by the States of the Union and not by the National Govern-[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman want more time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I have stated the case. Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, in reply to my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], he knows quite as well as I do that the Committee on the Judiciary, with the work now pending before it, will be absolutely unable to give due and proper consideration to this question.

The gentleman from Alabama refers to the fact that that committee had jurisdiction of this question when the Republican Party was in power. It is true; and the gentleman from Alabama also knows that one of the reasons why there is a Democratic majority here to-day was the fact that he and I, in common with many others, asserted then, as the fact was, that the Judiciary Committee was a morgue for all good legislation that was introduced into this House. [Applause.]
Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me, that was under a Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It was, and I am a Republican, and I criti-Mr. LENROOT. cized that quite as much as did the gentleman from Alabama; and the gentleman from Alabama now admits that so far as this resolution is concerned he and his party propose that the Judiciary Committee shall be a morgue for this resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentieman allow me?
Mr. LENROOT. Yes.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is perfectly proper for a great party in this country to take a position on a measure.
Mr. LENROOT. Yes.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I have said that the Democratic Party last night took the distinctive position that it was not in favor of this legislation, because it was in favor of the States controlling the question of suffrage. Now, is it not perfectly proper, if that is the position of the party, not to report that resolution?

It is perfectly proper to oppose it, but it Mr. LENROOT. is not perfectly proper to deny upon a great question the right to a hearing, which you have done. Now, the gentleman from Alabama a moment ago, when I asked Lim whether he would favor giving the House itself an opportunity to vote upon this resolution, said he would not vote to give the House that opportunity, because he himself was not in favor of the resolution. Mr. Chairman, have we come to the point in this House where, because a man is opposed to a certain proposition, he is therefore opposed to the House itself having a right to vote

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman will not misquote me? Mr. LENROOT. I did not misquote the gentleman. I appeal to the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman misunderstood me, then. I not only said I was opposed to it, but I said the party on this side of the Chamber was opposed to it, and the party that has control of the legislation in Congress certainly has the right openly and aboveboard to say that it will not support a measure if it is not in accordance with its principles.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but there is a distinction between supporting a measure and giving the House a right to vote upon the measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman recognizes the fact that we can not vote upon every measure.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, if the gentleman wishes to take the position that the Members on that side are unwilling to let the House of Representatives vote upon this question, then he is entirely welcome to take that position.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Wisconsin began his first remark by stating that the Democratic Party had taken its position last night, and it did, when by a two-thirds vote it fixed our position on that matter.

The gentleman from Alabama and I are get-Mr. LENROOT. ting very close together as to what the situation really is. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say for myself that if this resolution was reported to the House I should vote against it, and I am with the gentleman from Alabama, so far as State rights are concerned, upon this question, but I believe that this question is of such importance that the House itself ought to have the right to vote upon it, and the people of this country ought to have the right to know how every Member of this House stands individually upon that question, and, more than all, those who favor the resolution are entitled to a fair hearing and consideration of the subject, which is now denied them.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move the

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts

[Mr. GARDNER] be now closed.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will withhold that for five minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I will not.

Mr. GARDNER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman has withdrawn his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment, and the question now is—

Mr. MANN. Of course, that can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I object. Mr. BURNETT. Then I move that all debate on the amendment be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the adoption of the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 9, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, which has just been

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have any objection to striking out "three" and inserting "five." I was unavoidably detained, and therefore have not had the benefit of the discussion which I understand has taken place relative to the action of the Democratic caucus on the sub-

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment is to strike out "three" and insert "five." There are many more than five committees in the House. I do not recall the exact number of committees, but there are many more than five. One of those committees has to do with the question of how much mileage we are entitled to under the law.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Wyoming is not discussing the amendment before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Wyoming must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. MONDELL. The question is whether we shall strike out "three" and insert "five." I think that is more than the proportion in the Democratic caucus-

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming must proceed in order.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I invoke the rule that if the gentleman does not proceed in order he must take his seat. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming will confine himself to the question. Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming will discuss the question between "three" and "five." The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming must proceed in order and must not trifle with the Chair. He must be

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is material whether we strike out "three" and insert "five," but I think it is highly important that the most virtuous and intelligent half of American citizenship shall have an opportunity to be heard before a committee of Congress.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining himself to the subject before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is out of order. The gentleman is not confining himself to the subject before the committee. The point of order is sustained and has been repeatedly sustained, and the gentleman must proceed in

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, come to think of it, I am rather inclined to think that perhaps the striking out of "three" and the insertion of "five." five being a larger number ' five being a larger number than three, would be a most excellent thing. I do not understand why the Democratic caucus has not seen fit to increase the number of its committees.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question, and I move that he be made to take his seat.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not see that the gentleman is so far out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair thinks otherwise.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Does the Chair hold that on this amendment nothing can be discussed except the question of "three" or

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair holds nothing of the sort. Mr. MANN. But here is a proposition that says that all persons may be deported-

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's parliamentary

As to what the Chair holds. Mr. MANN.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the gentleman from Wyoming can not discuss some subject other than the subject before the committee, and no one knows better than the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Wyoming has not been confining himself to the subject before the committee.

Mr. MANN. As the Chair has used my name in connection with this matter-

The CHAIRMAN. Because the gentleman from Illinois asked the Chair a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Which the Chair has not answered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has answered it and will answer no further.

Mr. MANN. The Chair is disrespectful to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will take his

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is not addressing himself to the matter before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the gentleman has proceeded he is speaking to the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. He was not recognized by the Chair to speak a second time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the amendment be reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 9, strike out the word "three" and insert the word

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was about to remark when the gentleman from Massachusetts, who, like the gentleman from Alabama, does not want the question of woman suffrage discussed, interrupted me. I understand this amendment relates to the period of time within which certain aliens can be deported. Among the causes for which these deportations may be made is that of a belief in the unlawful destruction of property. Now, the people who desire to appear before committees of Congress in behalf of the most virtuous and intelligent half of American citizenship and their right to vote, are people who do not believe

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I insist that I shall not be interrupted.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the rules of the House be followed. I will read the rule:

If a Member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the Member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House.

And the Member, under the rules of the House, must take his seat.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Wyoming be permitted to proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that so far the gentleman film Wyoming has been proceeding in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust that as I proceed in order the Chair will protect me from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who is so much opposed to woman suffrage that he does not even want it discussed. I was remarking that those who desire to have a committee named in order that they may appear before it in behalf of a constitutional amendment which I have introduced, do not believe in the unlawful destruction of property, they are those who do believe

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order. The amendment has nothing to do with the unlawful destruc-

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the gentleman from Wyoming will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to ask the Chair if I have not been proceeding in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not when the gentleman is not discussing the amendment before the House. Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to disagree with the Chairman, but I was discussing the question of the destruction of property unlawfully.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was discussing an entirely different subject from the amendment now ending. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. MADDEN. Is not the subject of the amendment the question of the deportation of those who may have destroyed property in violation of law?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. SABATH. The amendment relates to the first two lines in section 19.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, it is the question as to whether the people live here more than three or less than five years, is it not? Mr. SABATH. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from the amendment and determine for himself. The gentleman from Illinois can examine

Mr. MADDEN. The purpose of my inquiry is to ascertain whether or not a man, having been recognized by the Chair, is entitled to discuss the question of who ought to be deported; and if so, when.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the Committee on Immigration as to this proposed amendment. It seems to me to be most severe. As I pointed out earlier in the day if anyone comes into this country a stowaway; if he comes into this country a vagrant; if he comes into this country on a ticket paid for by some association or some municipality, in all of those cases and in many others he must be held to have entered the United States in violation of the law. That is the law, and that is the way the law is construed by the Department of Labor. Mr. Chairman, it is severe enough to provide that such a man may be deported at any time within three years. It is severe enough to open the door so that for three years some blackmailer may say to that stowaway, "You got by the inspector, but I, who came over with you, know you were a stowaway, and unless you grease my palm I shall have you deported." It is bad enough that any man who came over here under promise of employment should for three years be at the mercy of the very man who secretly was instrumental in bringing him over here under promise of employment. Under the law as it is at present at any time within three years that man could come to the alien and say, "You must give me some money or I shall show you up and you will be deported." But that is the situation of the immigrant to-day who comes here in violation of law.

Even now, for three years after he arrives here there hangs over his head this sword of Damocles. No matter how prosperous he is, no matter how good a citizen he is, he can be deported at any time within three years if anyone can show that when be first arrived the immigration officers admitted him by mistake or were ignorant of all the circumstances. Gentlemen must realize that throughout this discussion I have almost uniformly been upon the side of stringency, but it is stringency in admitting people to this country which I favor, stringency pro-hibiting steamship companies from importing inadmissible aliens from foreign lands only to see them turned back at Ellis Island. It is the wide-open gates of admission which I hope Once a man has been admitted into this country, however, I believe that we ought to be very careful how we deport him, unless he is a criminal.

Mr. Chairman, as I said, this amendment was originally defeated in the Committee on Immigration, at all events according to the records and according to my memory. At a subsequent meeting, when it was adopted, I doubt whether the committee fully realized the full bearing of all these three amendments. The other two are well enough. I do not like them, but they are well enough. It seems to me, however, Mr. Chairman, that if the period that this sword of Damocles is to be suspended over well-meaning immigrants is to be extended from three to five years, we shall be doing a cruel thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat that I may make it clear in my mind as a member of the committee. He is now opposing, as I understand it, an amendment which offers to change the word "three" to the word "five" in line 9.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes. I am opposing any further extension of the time during which we require the deportation of aliens who have illegally entered this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly, because I think it is practically impossible to find them and requires quite an unnecessary hunt.

Mr. GARDNER. That is true. Moreover, there is a grave danger lest we give an opportunity for miscreants to blackmail

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I quite agree with the gentleman in what he says. Am I correct in supposing that the three-year period which he advocates at the present moment does not apply to the five-year provision we have adopted in line 11?

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is correct. There is no connection between the two propositions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama was to amend the first two lines of section 19, and those two lines read as follows:

That any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States in violation of law.

That is a provision providing for deportation. The amendment is to strike out "three" and insert "five." Those who are forbidden entry into the United States, and who if they enter in violation of the law, are enumerated in section 3:

That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States.

Among them are those who advocate or teach the destruction of property. A moment ago, when the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was attempting to discuss the question of deportation of those who advocate the unlawful destruction of property, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who temporarily had forgotten what was in the bill reported by the committee, raised a point of order against the gentleman from Wyoming on the ground that he could not discuss that proposition, because that was not covered by the amendment; and the Chair, not being familiar with the provisions in the bill to that extent, without any fault of the Chair, ruled the gentleman from Wyoming out of order at the instance of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and when I instance of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and when I endeavored to obtain a statement from the Chair as to what was in order the Chair ordered me to take my seat. The present occupant of the chair makes a very good Chairman; I believe, on the whole, that he is about the best Chairman the Democrats put in the chair; but possibly, nagged a little by the gentleman from Wyoming, whom the Chair feared was going to discuss something out of order and whom the gentleman from Massachusetts feared was going to discuss something out of order thing out of order-

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN (continuing). The Chair ruled out of order the discussion of the subject of the deportation of persons who advocated the unlawful destruction of property.

Mr. GARDNER. Did not the gentleman from Illinois think that the gentleman from Wyoming was discussing that which was not in order?

Mr. MANN. I did not; I have no doubt that if the gentleman from Wyoming had been permitted to proceed ad libitum he would have done what the gentleman from Alabama has just done, discussed the woman suffrage question.

Mr. GARDNER. Ah, yes.
Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wyoming up to the time he took his seat had discussed nothing that was not in order under the terms of this bill, because the bill prohibits the admission of militant suffragettes. That is the whole subject.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not in the interest of good government that a serious question like this should be voted on now, when the discussion is fresh in men's minds, rather than you should go to a question of whether the gentleman from Wyoming was or was not properly taken off his feet?

Mr. MANN. I do not know of any question of government more serious or more important than preserving to the Members of this House the right to be heard under the rules of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARDNER. I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not now proceeding under the rules of the House. He is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I was discussing the amendment; but the gentle-man from Massachusetts asked me a question, and then objected to my answering it.

Mr. GARDNER. I was calling attention to the inconsistency. Mr. MANN. I was discussing the proposition involved in the amendment, which is the length of time during which people may be admitted who come into the United States, among whom are militant suffragettes, and when I courteously answer the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] he says that I am talking out of order. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Donovan] offers a pro forma amendment. Mr. DONOVAN. I would like to have the Clerk read these telegrams in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the telegrams in the time of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the section and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. BROWN of New York. I would like to offer two amendments

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 44.

Mr. MOORE. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. Burnerr and Mr. Moore took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported-ayes 57, noes 45.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnett].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the

Mr. SABATH. Division, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Division is demanded.
Mr. SABATH. I withdraw the demand, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. BURNETT. I renew the demand, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 27.
Mr. GARDNER. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.
Tellers were ordered, and Mr. Burnett and Mr. Gardner took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were-ayes 56, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division. The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers two amendments, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first amendment be read first, and that the second be not read until after the first has been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, line 15, strike out the word "three" and substitute the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three or four minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope that will be granted. The gentleman from New York has been trying to get in several times, and I hope the Chairman will permit that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that from now on, in order to facilitate the passage of this bill, I shall object to all requests for unanimous consent for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr.

Brown] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, no alien can be-Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, no alien come a citizen of the United States inside of five years. to that time he is a stranger in a sense, and yet, if he become a public charge because of conditions existing prior to the landing within two years before his eligibility to citizenship he remains a public charge on the community in which he is temporarily domiciled. No State has a voice in his admission to that particular State, and yet all States must care for him and for his descendants if he or they should prove defectives.

Mr. Chairman, the cost to the Federal Government, out of the $4 head tax paid by each immigrant for his medical examination is the large sum of 16 cents. As I have already stated here, the State of New York expends about $3,500,000 a year in taking care of the alien insane who never should have been admitted. Now, the Federal Government took hold of this proposition in 1882, and it made the period of deportation within one year. In 1903 it made it two years. In 1907 it made it three years.

The State of New York is obliged to maintain a bureau of deportation—they call it "deportation," but I think it is wrongly named—for the purpose of assisting home those aliens who have become public charges, who wish to return to the countries whence they came in order that their families may take care of them and in order that they may be buried in the old country whence they came.

In 1912 the State of New York repatriated 439 insane aliens who had become public charges after they had been in the State three years and before they had been in the State for five years. This meant a saving to the State of $1,265,198.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that by reason of this very absurd medical examination at ports of entry, which is the best pos-sible, considering the fact that the Government appropriates only enough money to equal 16 cents a head for that purpose, this period of deportation for causes existing prior to landing should be extended from three years to five years. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROWN]

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, line 15, strike out the word "three" and substitute the word "five."

Mr. BURNETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that. I want to ask unanimous consent to have three minutes in which to oppose that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Linthicum] will not oppose that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I shall oppose all unanimous consent for time.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope that will be voted down.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brown],

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were-ayes 57, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the other amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, in line 16, strike out the words "from causes existing prior to the landing" and insert in lieu thereof the words "unless the said alien can show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that the causes for becoming a public charge did not exist prior to the landing."

Mr. BROWN of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman— The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brown] may have three minutes in which to make his statement, and that somebody be recognized to answer him.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.
The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROWN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BROWN of New York. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were-ayes 38, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sc. 20. That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act shall, at the option of the Secretary of Labor, be to the country whence they came or to the foreign port at which such aliens embarked for the United States; or, if such embarkation was for foreign contiguous territory; to the foreign port at which they embarked for such territory; or, if such aliens entered foreign contiguous territory; to the foreign port at which they embarked for such territory; or, if such aliens are held by the country from which they entered the United States not to be subjects or citizens of such country, and such country refuses to permit their reentry, or imposes any condition upon permitting reentry, then to the country of which such aliens are subjects or citizens, or to the country in which they resided prior to entering the country from which they entered the United States. If effected at any time within five years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that can not be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation line by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If such deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, during the debate on this bill allusion was made to the State of New York, and there were some allusions also to the city of New York. I desire to call the attention of the committee—

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman— The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to make a point of order?

Mr. GARDNER. I desire to ask what is the question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldrockel was recognized-

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If the gentleman wishes to be so formal, I will move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I repeat what I have just said, that during the debate on this bill allusion was made to the State of New York and to the city of New York. I deem it my duty, coming from the State of New York, to call the attention of the committee to the fact that yesterday the lower house of our legislature passed a resolution calling upon the Congress to vote against the literacy or educational clause in this bill. On Saturday last my colleague [Mr. Cantona cause in this bill. On Saturday last my colleague [Mr. Cantona] called the attention of this committee to the fact that the sentiment of the State of New York was against this literacy test; and the fact that the assembly of that great State, which has within it such an enormous number of the foreign born, passed the resolution protesting against the educational test, is the strongest confirmation of the statements made last Saturday by my colleague [Mr. Canton].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. BARTHOLDT. What is the political complexion of the Legislature of the State of New York at the present time?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Very black. [Laughter.] Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The assembly is Republican, the senate is Democratic.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer certain other amendments, and I wish to say to the chairman of the committee [Mr. Burnett] that these will be all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 42, line 6, strike out the word "may" and substitute the word "shall."

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is very largely a humanitarian amendment, but it has also to do with the safety of all coming in contact with aliens who are being deported.

Since 1907 there has been an understanding between the Department of Commerce and Labor-now the Department of Labor—and the steamship companies that the department will receive from the steamship companies a statement as to the physical condition and well-being of aliens being returned, and a receipt from some person signing for them, in lieu of persons accompanying the aliens. This amendment would make it mandatory on the Secretary of Labor, if he deemed it a dangerous case, to send some one to accompany the alien to his or her destination. Most Members will doubtless remember that in 1911 Anton Gross was certified to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor as having delusions of persecution, and that he was not safe to travel by himself.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of New York. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Certified by whom? Mr. BROWN of New York. Certified by the surgeon in charge of the hospital where Anton Gross was confined.

Mr. GARDNER. But not a United States or State hospital, was it?

Mr. BROWN of New York. It was a State hospital, and he was a public charge within three years after his admission to the country, and he was about to be deported. Instead of sending somebody with this alien, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor sent a blank paper form. The alien landed, and after a little he went to a city in the interior, bought himself a revolver, and went to a hotel. While there he was seized with his delusion and became convinced that the waiters and guests of the hotel were pursuing him. Consequently he opened fire on everybody in sight. The police of that city fortunately shot him before he did anything more serious than to wound some of the waiters, and that was a very fortuitous ending of the If I had the time, I could mention other cases, including that of Tillie Ostrokowsky, but I have not the time to do so.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment be adopted, both for humanitarian reasons and for the purpose of protecting those who are brought in contact with the deported aliens.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a dangerous amendment. The fact is, we give the Secretary of Labor the right to decide whether a deported alien needs anyone to accompany him. He may decide that the man does not need anybody to accompany him, because his wife is already accompanying him. He may decide that a woman does not need anybody to accompany her, because her son is accompanying her. This amendment would require the Secretary of Labor to hire somebody to accompany the outgoing alien. More than that, it will give rise to needless controversies. Who is to decide whether the alien needs assistance? When anyone chooses to assert to the Secretary of Labor that such and such a deportable alien is in a condition that requires personal care or attendance the Secretary of Labor would perhaps be liable to a suit if he took the opposite view. The gentleman from New York did not bring this matter before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization

Mr. BROWN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. In one minute. The Committee on Immigration was never told the story about this deported alien who ran amuck in foreign parts. I do not mean to say that it is the gentleman's fault that he did not bring the matter to the attention of the committee. The gentleman asked to be heard, but our hearings were already closed. Perhaps this is one of the matters on which he wanted to be heard. A good way to do when gentlemen have a succession of amendments and they can not be heard by the committee is to ask to have them referred to the department. Unless we have a report from the department, how can you expect us on the floor of the House to be sufficiently familiar with these questions to enable us to act on them offhand.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the second amendment and address myself to the last amendment for three minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. I ask that this amendment be put first. Mr. BROWN of New York. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the second amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order that there is an amendment pending.

The Chair understands that, but we will The CHAIRMAN. get through with that in a moment. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw the second amendment and to proceed for three minutes on the other amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to offer the third amendment now?

Mr. BROWN of New York. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 42 add a new section, to be known as section 20a, to read as follows:

"That hereafter it shall be unlawful for the owner, agent, or master of a transportation company or vessel engaged in the transportation of aliens into the United States to refuse to sell tickets for transportation to his or her native country or, having sold tickets for such transportation, to receive on board any alien who was brought to the United States by a vessel owned by such transportation company or owner or his or their legal successors or assigns, who, at the time that application for such ticket shall be made, shall be an inmate of any institution in the United States which is supported wholly or in part by public funds: Provided, That the arrival of such alien by a vessel owned by such transportation company or owner shall be verified by a United States Commissioner of Immigration: Provided further, That it shall be certified by the superintendent or principal medical officer of such public institution that such alien inmate is in condition to travel with safety to himself or herself or others: Provided further, That such alien inmate is not suffering from a quarantinable disease: Provided further, That when necessary for the safety of such alien inmate a suitable attendant shall be provided without expense to such transportation company or owner.

"That any person, including the owner, agent, or master of any transportation company or vessel, who shall refuse to sell tickets for the transportation of such alien inmates or, having sold such tickets, shall refuse to receives such alien inmates on board, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding $500 for each and every such alien inmate for whom transportation is received or who is not received on board."

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, to understand the

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, to understand the reasons for adopting this amendment I will state briefly the condition of affairs in the State of New York.

The State of New York maintains a bureau of deportation, which might better be called a bureau of repatriation, because only the Federal Government can deport aliens. What this bureau does is to return to their homes at the expense of the State or at the expense of friends such persons who will be properly cared for at home and who want to go there.

In 1912 the United States Immigration Service deported 419 aliens who had been admitted to the United States who had become public charges in State hospitals or homes. In the same year the State repatriated 474 aliens at the expense of the State and 278 at the expense of friends, which makes a total of 752 repatriated by the State as against 474 deported by the United States Government. Of those 752 repatriated 439 were public charges in the State hospitals, so this bureau saved the State of New York, figuring the usual cost of $2,882 per patient hospital life, the great sum of $1,265,198 in the year 1912

Now, when this bureau buys tickets for an alien and an attendant, if necessary, the alien's family and friends having satisfied the bureau that they not only want the alien home but are in a position to care for him or her, and when the bureau tries to place the alien on board a ship, it is continually confronted with a refusal on the part of certain steamship companies to allow the aliens on board.

It is to cover these cases that I have offered this amendment. The surgeons on the returning ships examine each passenger most carefully for mental and physical defect, and refuse passage to the defective. There is no examination worthy of the name at the ports of embarkation by these surgeons, so they pass all kinds of defectives to us and will not take them back.

Federal legislation is the only method of relief.

Had I time I should be glad to go into the cases of Carmelo Cantanzaro, Savenio Marano, Cammillo Cantoni, John Casulo, and Philomena Masitto as being typical of this scandalous condition of affairs.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost,

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 22. That wherever an allen shall have taken up his permanent residence in this country and shall have filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and thereafter shall send for his wife or minor children to join him, if said wife or any of said children shall be found to be affected with any contagious disorder, such wife or children shall be held, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor shall prescribe, until it shall be determined whether the disorder will be easily curable or whether they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons; and they shall not be either admitted or deported until such facts have been ascertained; and if it shall be determined that the disorder is easily curable and the husband or father or other responsible person is willing to bear the expense of the treatment, they may be accorded treatment in hospital until cured and then be admitted, or if it shall be determined that they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons, they may, if otherwise admissible, thereupon be admitted.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, just what is this literacy test for immigrants? It provides that any immigrant over 16 years old must be able to read a little in his or her own language. Even to this mild restriction there are generous excep-tions. Families are not to be broken up. If only one of them can read, he or she can bring in pretty much all the rest of the household, except grown-up sons. If a reading test had been in force last year for aliens over 14 years of age, some 300,000 of those aliens who came in here would have been excluded. That is a pretty big slice to exclude, I think. Of course the steamship companies would probably have brought quite a number of other immigrants in place of those excluded. That would have lessened the dimensions of the slice, to be sure. On the other hand, many an immigrant untruthfully told the inspector that he was able to read, and no one was able to show up his ignorance. Unfortunately, no provision exists in our laws for verifying the truth of an immigrant's assertion as to his reading capacity. If the literacy test reduces immigration by 300,000 per annum, that is the most which can be expected of it.

A dozen years ago every restrictionist favored a different method of restriction, and every pretended restrictionist stoutly asserted his abiding belief in some method or other of restriction which stood no chance of adoption. Gradually the restrictionists in the House and in the Senate came to see that the literacy test could command the greatest amount of support. Meanwhile the labor organizations came to the same conclusion. Along in 1907 the Immigration Commission was appointed, nine experts in all. At first Prof. Jenks, of Cornell, and Dr. Neill, of the United States Bureau of Labor, both members of the commission, were doubtful about the literacy test. Finally, after two years of study eight out of the nine commissioners joined in recommending the literacy test as the most important step to be taken. That it is perfect no one will contend, but surely we must all admit that 300,000 aliens who can read would probably make better citizens than the 300,000 illiterate aliens whom we admitted last year. To hold otherwise is to indict our commonschool system. However, the commission recommended the literacy test, not as a selective measure but as a means of curtailing the congested oversupply of unskilled labor. The su-periority of the individual immigrant under this system was regarded as a fortunate incidental advantage.

For many years I have listened to the argument that the anarchist and the gumman and the procurer can read, while many a horny-handed honest laborer does not possess that accomplishment. I freely admit the fact. It is also true that honest men can be found in gambling houses and that thieves can be found in church. Yet for all that I should not recom-mend the passage of any legislation based on the supposition that the frequenters of gambling houses are more desirable citizens than are the churchgoers.

The gentleman on my right has spoken jauntily to the effect that it is easy enough for me to support this bill because, as he puts it, I represent a Yankee constituency. A Yankee stituency I surely represent, but not in the sense in which he uses the word "Yankee." I believe it to be the fact that less than half the voters of my district are of English or Scotch descent. More than half, I suppose, are either Irish or French Canadians by descent, but we are all so mixed up together that it is pretty hard to tell the difference except by our names. We do not have much of this race or religious prejudice business down our way.

Of course the Irish and the French Canadians would not be affected to any extent by this literacy test. All Irish and Canadian children are taught to read nowadays, and the old people would be admitted, anyway, whether they could read

It is different with the Jews, however, and there are a good many Jews in my district. About one Jew in five who comes to this country is unable to read, so this restriction strikes home in Jewish circles. The way the Jew feels about it is this: He has been a target for race and religious prejudice for such a long time that he naturally looks suspiciously on any proposed legislation which may in any way prevent him acquiring that power which numbers give. There is no denying the fact that this legislation would exclude a good many pretty wholesome Jews who might desire to come over here. On the other hand, it would protect many an equally wholesome American Jew against an overstocked labor market.

All honor to the Jew who desires that his brother in Russia should share in the liberty and prosperity of the United States. All honor to the Italian who is willing to risk an oversupply of the labor which is his only capital if he may but share his opportunities with his own race. Such men as these may be prejudiced; they may be unjust to us who disagree with them; but at least they are unselfish. The seekers after cheap labor are indeed fortunate to have such allies

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask whether the Clerk in beginning this section 20 read the words "The whereever"? In the copy of the bill I have it begins "The wherever." It is a misprint

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE. I move to strike out the word "the" and the word "that" be substituted.

Mr. GARDNER. And the gentleman should move to strike out "wherever" and insert "whenever."

Without objection, the amendments will The CHAIRMAN. be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I should object to "whenever" being inserted, because "wherever" is correct.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. This was suggested by the department, and the existing law has the word "whenever."

Mr. MANN. It does not make good sense.

Mr. GARDNER. I think it does.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask the Clerk to read the following telegram published in the New York Tribune of to-day in reference to alien insane.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALIEN INSANE NEW YORK EURDEN—GOV. GLYNN ASKS THAT IT BE SHIFTED TO UNITED STATES.

ALBANY, N. Y., February 2, 1914.

ALBANY, N. Y., February 2, 1914.

A plea for the transference from the State to the Federal Government of the care of the allen insane is embodied in a message sent by Gov. Glynn to the legislature to-night. The governor pointed out that more than a third of the money spent in the maintenance of New York's hospitals for the insane is devoted to the care of allens.

"The average length of hospital residence," the message recites, "is 9.85 years. Consequently, on the basis of the figures for 1912, the 9.241 allens in the State's hospitals represent a total burden upon present and future taxpayers of $25,412,038."

It is urged that the legislature adopt concurrent resolutions calling upon Congress te raise the limit for deportation to five years, and transfer from the State to the National Government the cost of maintaining the alien insane.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on section 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request in regard to section 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Where there is a request to extend remarks in the Record, would not that permit the Member to extend his remarks on any part of the bill? The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

A SHIP IN

Mr. MANN. I take it that permission to extend remarks in the RECORD does not mean that gentleman can extend them forty times

The CHAIRMAN. No. The inquiry was whether they could not be extended with reference to different sections of the bill. Mr. MANN. Oh, undoubtedly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN. Oh, undoubtedly.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That the Commissioner General of Immigration shall perform all his duties under the direction of the Secretary of Labor. Under such direction he shall have charge of the administration of all laws relating to the immigration of allens into the United States, and shall have the control, direction, and supervision of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed thereunder; he shall establish such reports, entries, and other papers, and shall issue from time to time such instructions, not inconsistent with law, as he shall deem best calculated for carrying out the provisions of this act and for protecting the United States and allens migrating thereto from fraud and loss, and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such allens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native country, at any time within three years after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act, such as fall into distress or need public aid from causes arising subsequent to their entry and are desirous of being so removed; he shall prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens along the borders of Canada and Mexico, so as not unnecessarily to delay, impede, or annoy persons in ordinary travel between the United States and said countries, and shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the said purpose; it shall be the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to detail officers of the Immigration Service from time to time as may be necessary, in his judgment, to secure information as to the number of aliens detained in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions (public and private) of the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and other territory of the United States and to inform the officers of such institutions of the provisions of law in relation to the deportation of aliens who have become public charges. He may, wi

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, my attention has been called to page 44, line 10, where the word "bond" appears, and in order to conform to the other reports, and so forth, I presume the plural of that word should be used. I therefore move to strike out the word "bond" and insert in lieu thereof the word bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 44, line 10, by striking out the word "bond" and inserting the word "bonds."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is incorrect. The current law uses this language:

Such forms of bond, reports, entries, and other papers.

Does not the gentleman think that better English than saying "such forms of bonds"?

Mr. MOORE. If there is only one bond to be entered, very well; but there will be bonds, as there are reports and as there are entries and other papers.

Mr. GARDNER. I am not going to quarrel with the gentleman over the English of it. I do not see any reason to change the law as it stands.

AL HERE

Mr. BURNETT. That law has been construed by the department.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist upon his amendment?

Mr. MOORE. If the committee does not accept the amendment, I shall withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his amendment and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That immigrant inspectors and other immigration officers, clerks, and employees shall hereafter be appointed and their compensation fixed and raised or decreased from time to time by the Secretary of Labor, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner General of Immigration and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, That said Secretary, in the enforcement of that portion of this act which excludes contract laborers, may employ, without reference to the provisions of the said civil-service act, or to the various acts relative to the compilation of the official register, such persons as he may deem advisable and from time to time fix, raise, or decrease their compensation. He may draw annually from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended for the salaries and expenses of persons so employed and for expenses incident to such employment; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall pass to the credit of the proper disbursing officer expenditures from said sum without itemized account whenever the Secretary of Labor certifies that an itemized account would not be for the best interests of the Government: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to after the mode of appointing commissioners of immigration at the several ports of the United States as provided by the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 18, 1894, or the official status of such commissioners heretofore appointed.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the arguments advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnerr] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Austrn] in favor of the literacy test, I desire, first, to call the attention of the Members to the views of President Cleveland, as expressed by him in a message vetoing a measure similar to the one we now have under consideration. President Cleveland said:

The ability to read and write as required in this bill, in and of itself affords, in my opinion, a misleading test of contented industry, and supplies unsatisfactory evidence of desirable citizenship or a proper apprehension of the benefits of our institutions.

And we find that only last year, when President Taft vetoed practically the same bill that we now have before us, his veto message read in part as follows:

I can not make up my mind to sign a bill which in its chief provision violates a principle that ought, in my opinion, to be upheld in dealing with our immigration.

Then, too, let us carefully consider the views of the greatest President this country has ever known, Woodrow Wilson, as set forth in a letter to a prominent Philadelphian, in which he says:

I think that this country can afford to use and ought to give opportunity to every man and woman of sound morals, sound mind, and sound body, who comes in good faith to spend his or her energies in our life, and I should certainly be inclined, so far as I am concerned, to scrutinize very jealously any restrictions that would limit that principle in practice.

Again, in reply to an inquiry from a newspaper, we find him saying that-

I, like other Democrats, have always held liberal views with regard to immigration. I feel that it would be inconsistent with our historical character as a Nation if we did not offer a very hearty welcome to every honest man and woman who comes to this country to seek a permanent home and a new opportunity.

Quite recently a number of prominent educators throughout the country were asked their opinion as to the desirability of imposing a literacy test upon incoming aliens, and I quote below the views of a number of these gentlemen:

[Harry Pratt Judson, LL. D., president University of Chicago, Chicago, III.]

If we can establish a test which will exclude those who are really undesirable—that is, who are unlikely to make intelligent, industrious, and law-abiding citizens—such test I shall approve. I do not believe that the literacy test conforms to that condition.

[Bernard J. Otting, S. J., president St. Louis University, St. Louis, Mo.] I can not respect the intelligence of the man who can make literacy the test of fitness, and I am driven to suspect some underlying motive, which he is assamed to make public, in the statesman who would make this test the 'aw.

[Edward Cummings, S. J., president Spring Hill College, Mobile, Ala.] Read the roster of our great men these days and you will find them children of men that came over here to escape persecution without, perchance, the knowledge of the alphabet.

[Lyon G. Tyler, LL. D., president College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va.]

Hilteracy is a mere accident that may affect a family in one genera-tion, but be conspicuously absent from succeeding generations.

[George Lewis Mackintosh, president Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Ind.]

Unquestionably immigrants who could not measure up to the most rudimentary test of literacy may yet be industrious, honest, and very desirable men.

[George S. Davis, LL. D., president Normal College of the city of New York,]

It [the literacy test] would be inadequate and misleading, often resulting in the exclusion of worthy and desirable additions to our population.

[John Cavanaugh, C. S. C., president University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Ind.]

I am convinced that the effort to restrict immigration by a literacy test is un-American as well as unwise.

[James A. B. Scherer, LL. D., president Throop College of Technology, Pasadena, Cal.]

I used to incline toward a belief in much stricter immigration laws, but upon becoming acquainted with the sons and daughters of possibly objectionable immigrants, I saw that the "melting pot" does its work effectively and advantageously.

[Stephen M. Newman, D. D., president Howard University, Washington, D. C.]

Some of the best immigrants who ever came to America could not read when they landed, but settled down into helpful American lives. I do not believe that a literacy test should be enacted.

[Herbert L. Stetson, LL. D., president Kalamazoo College, Kalamazoo, Mich.]

I believe that immigrants fleeing from religious and political persecution should not be subjected to a literacy test, should such test be enacted.

[Winthrop E. Stone, LL. D., president Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind.]

There are many valuable men and women who could be of service in this country who possibly can not read and write.

I have before me an article from the pen of Mr. Francis E. Hamilton, former solicitor to the collector of the port of New York, and a man who had the very best opportunity imaginable to note the effect of immigration, and I find that he says:

The immigration act recently passed, but vetoed by President Taft, contained a number of cumbersome and nonworkable provisions and was also most unjust in its "literacy test." Legislators should not forget that the public records of the United States prove conclusively that a large percentage of those who were the pioneers of this country, ancestors it may be of the present members of the Society of the Mayflower, the Daughters of the Revolution, and even the Society of the Cincinnati, were men and women who could neither read nor write, who signed deeds and other documents with a cross, but who laid the foundations of this country and its present government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard so much about the various organizations that demand this legislation, let me read an extract from a letter to me by a man who classes himself as "only a private citizen," but who was for 25 years a member of the faculty of George Washington University and a lecturer at Yale, Princeton, and Copenhagen, and who during the past 10 years has devoted his attention to international questions. Here is a man, Prof. James H. Gore, who has devoted many years of his life to the study of just such questions as this, and we find him saying that:

There is nothing on which to base the argument that a literate person would more quickly become prepared to enjoy the privileges of citizenship, while on the contrary it is the universal experience that persons unable to read acquire a speaking knowledge of a foreign tongue more quickly than his fortunate brother.

Then, too, we find Prof. Gore expressing the opinion that:

It would be a great mistake to place an embargo on willing hands and brawny muscle. It would be much better to increase the efficiency of our existing machinery for distributing the arriving aliens so that the supply might reach our vast and scattered demands.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that one gentleman can not interrupt another on the floor by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can interrupt another with point of order. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. My point of order is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] is not addressing himself to the paragraph that has just been read; but I am not so particular with regard to these matters as other gentlemen are. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, not wishing to take any more of the time of the committee than is necessary, I shall only read short extracts from the many protests that I have received against the passage of this bill.

I have here the combined protest of the German-American State Alliances of Kentucky and Ohio, in which they-

Emphatically protest against the adoption of the Burnett immigration bill, as it is detrimental to the welfare of the country. * * * Physically well-built men and women, desirable immigrants, who on account of their moral worth would improve the citizenship of our country ought to be welcomed in this land of liberty instead of being excluded for not passing the test provided in the Burnett bill.

The following is an extract from a resolution adopted at a mass meeting attended by the very best citizens of Cincinnati:

Be it resolved. That all legislation restricting immigration beyond keeping out the criminal and the diseased is both unjust and unwise and in flagrant contradiction to the principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence.

The General Laborers' International Union desires to go on record as being opposed to this test, and in their letter I find the following:

We can not see any reason why a man ought to be excluded simply because he can not read or write. The most dangerous characters coming to this country from Europe and other lands are well educated.

The resolutions adopted by the Polish National Alliance state in part that-

The downtrodden and oppressed of every clime for years have looked upon these United States as an asylum where all could enter and enjoy liberty and freedom. * * * We feel convinced that literacy or educational tests would and do in no wise indicate the morals, conscience, honesty, integrity, and industry of those that desire to come to our land.

The following extract is from a resolution adopted by the Board of Commissioners of Cook County, Ill.

The conditions in some of the countries of Europe are such that moral, honest, and industrious men and women can not secure an education, and they seek to come to this country in the hope of improving them-selves under the beneficent influence of free institutions and our free Government. * * We hereby cheerfully give testimony to Mem-bers of Congress, before whom the new restrictive immigration measures are pending, that the foreign-speaking citizenship of our community is a most desirable element, and that neither the paupers or disturbers come from the moral, honest, and industrious peasant, artisan, or crafts-man of Europe, who, although they may not be sufficiently schooled to pass educational or literacy tests, come here and make worthy and de-sirable citizens. sirable citizens.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have before me hundreds of resolutions and letters from organizations and individuals all over the United States protesting in the strongest terms against the enactment of this legislation, but my time is so limited that I will not be able to read any more.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Certainly. Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not a fact that the hearings before the committee showed that 18 States in the Union had passed resolutions in favor of the restriction of undesirable immigration?

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is mistaken in that, the same as he is in a great many other of his statements.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the gentleman have allusion to the statement I made-

Mr. SABATH. And if the gentleman's information in other instances has not been any more accurate than it is in this case, I realize why during the debate he has so often insisted that immigration is not beneficial to our country.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. SABATH. I have already answered it.
Mr. AUSTIN. Then the gentleman states that the hearings and the RECORD do not show that 18 States have passed resolutions favoring restriction of immigration?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, to the best of my belief there was no such evidence introduced before our committee. I am of the opinion that there are some States that have gone on record, and very likely the gentleman's State is one of these.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Austin] has continually been insinuating that these immigrants do not make desirable citizens, and while it was not my intention to take up any more of the committee's time, I can not resist the temptation to supply the gentleman with some information relative to the progress of the city which I have the honor to represent in part. Chicago to-day has a population of around 2,500,000, and 80 per cent of these people are of foreign birth or of foreign parentage. There are within its borders hundreds of thousands of Germans, Irish, Bohemians, Poles, Jews, Italians, Scandinavians, Norwegians, Slovanians, Lithuanians, and those of other nationalities, people whom the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] have seen fit to designate as "undesirables." These people have demonstrated time and time again that they are honest, industrious, law-abiding, and virtuous, and that they make very desirable citizens.

Our city, which to-day has an area of 191 square miles, was incorporated in 1837, and it was not until 1848 that the first railroad penetrated its borders. To-day we have 288 large public schools, in which there are employed 6,740 teachers and in which there were enrolled over 300,000 pupils in 1912. We have within the boundaries of the city 35 medical schools, 138 banks, and 1,138 churches and chapels. There are over 740 newspapers and periodicals edited in our city. In 1911 the duties collected on imported merchandise and the internal revenue collected in Chicago district totaled over $22,000,000. The value of the products of our manufacturing plants is in excess of $1,500,000,000 annually. Our bank clearings are nearly $15,-000,000,000 annually, and our appropriations amount to over $70,000,000 per year.

Gentlemen, think for a moment what has been accomplished by the people who have made their homes in Chicago. As I stated before, our city was only incorporated in 1837, and, as you know, it was practically wiped out by the great conflagration in 1871. And now our city, with 80 per cent of its people of foreign birth or foreign parentage, is the wonder of the age. It is the center of education, of invention, of industry, of art, of music, and of everything that contributes to the progress and elevation of the human race. Gentlemen, I proudly point to it as an example of what the immigrants have done for our country. [Applause.] Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition-

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question? Mr. SABATH, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not a fact that the American Federation of Labor of Chicago passed a resolution favoring this legislation?

Mr. SABATH. I desire to say that if the Federation of Labor in the city of Chicago has passed such a resolution I am not aware of it. I do not know of a single labor organization in Chicago that has adopted a resolution favoring the passage of this bill. The city of Chicago is the strongest labor-union city in our country, and wages are higher and conditions are better there than anywhere else; and this is mainly due to the fact that nearly 80 per cent of its inhabitants are of foreign birth or foreign parentage

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. AUSTIN. I will be glad to give the gentleman the infor-

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. In reply to the gentleman I want to call his attention to the fact that I have here the names of 30 college presidents, which I desire to insert in the RECORD, who have gone on record in statements that they are in favor of this legislation. It is also interesting to note that the present president of Harrt is also interesting to note that the present president of Harvard, Mr. Eliot's successor, Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell, is strongly in favor of the illiteracy test. Many members of the faculty in the city of Chicago are among those. There are Profs. Breasted, Butler, Carpenter, Marshall, Moore, Strong, Williston, and Young, all strongly in favor of it in the gentleman's own city. A gentleman the other day quoted from Dr. Eliot as being against the literacy test, and yet I have here a strong communication from Dr. Eliot, or a telegram-

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield there? Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I think the gentleman from Alabama is mistaken if he states that I have quoted from Prof. Eliot, for I have not.

Mr. BURNETT. There was a gentleman, I said, and that was the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. Coary, who made the quotation, Mr. Chairman, and I have here a communication or a telegram of an interview with Prof. Eliot, who when president of Harvard College enforced as a necessary qualification for admission the ability to pass an educational test, in which he denounces the labor union and favors the open shop, and virtually said the unions are destroying the country, and I want to know if Congressman Coady quotes him as an expert authority and follows also in the matter of the desirability of labor organizations as well as this particular legislation which they desire and demand to help them in their efforts to better the workingmen of this country. I desire also to place in the Record the names of more than 56 different organizations in the country, comprising such organizations as the American Agents' Association, American Federation of Labor, Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders of America, Carpenters and Joiners' National Brotherhood, Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, National Brotherhood of Coal Hoisting Engineers, Commercial Travelers of the United States, Core Makers' International Union, Electrical Workers of America, Farmers' National Congress, United Garment Workers of America

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman pardon me at that point? Is it not a fact that the Garment Workers' Union of New York expressed itself as against the educational clause

Mr. BURNETT. That may be true, Mr. Chairman; I am not surprised if it is; but this is the United Garment Workers of America, and not of New York. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Goldfogle] is one of those gentlemen with a narrow environment, who has not learned that America embraces anything but New York. Mr. Chairman, the same thing is true of the very fellows we want to keep out. They are the men on the other side who think that New York City is the United States. Mr. Chairman, I found all over southern Italy when they speak of New York City they seem to think that the whole of America was New York City. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] the other day spoke of the lack of opportunities that aliens have to learn to read, and yet there are in southern Italy 56 per cent of the people over 14 years of age who are so absolutely illiterate that they are unable to read their own language, while only 6 per cent of the people of northern Italy are unable to read, although opportunities throughout all Italy, in so far as the Government is concerned, are the same. with the commission on its foreign tour, I asked the Italian commissioner of immigration of Italy, Mr. Rossi, how it was that under the same King, with the same Parliament, with the same laws, that that striking contrast of literacy and illiteracy existed, and he said: "Mr. Burnett, I am bound to admit to you that it is the difference between the white man and the man of mixed blood." Lack of opportunity? Not at all. makes his own opportunities to a very large degree. He can have schools and free institutions if he demands them. Gentlemen talk about these being the ancient Romans. They are no more ancient Romans than we are. They are the descendants of those who came chained to the chariot wheels of the ancient Romans, and came behind their conquering eagles as slaves. They came from the blood of the Saracens, Arabs, Moors, and Africans across the Mediterranean.

Mr. MANAHAN. Will the getleman yield? Mr. BURNETT. I must decline to yield. Gentlemen, they are the descendants of those who came chained to the chariot wheels of the ancient Romans, and came behind their conquering eagles as their slaves. They are those who came from the blood of the Saracens, Arabs, Moors, and Africans who are across the Mediterranean.

The Association of Foreign Language Newspapers, with headquarters in New York City and Chicago, an organization which has for several years taken a prominent part in opposition to any further restriction of immigration, has recently, as a part of its campaign against the pending Burnett immigration bill, published a list of 10 college presidents who are alleged to be against the bill and in favor of a "liberal immigration policy."

This article might convey to those not familiar with the sentiment on this subject the idea that American educators generally share the opinion of the few quoted by the Association of Foreign Language Newspapers. To show that, on the con-trary, an overwhelming majority of our educators feel that restriction of immigration is a vital necessity if American ideals and standards of living are to survive, I have here a list of 30 college presidents in favor of the further restriction of immigration:

A. Lawrence Lowell, president Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass. John N. Tillman, president University of Arkansas, Fayetteville, Ark. J. C. Branner, vice president Leland Stanford University, California, K. G. Matheson, president Georgia School of Technology, Atlanta, Dr. A. C. Cowpenthwaite, president Chicago Homeopathic Medical College, Chicago, Ill.

Of the 10 college presidents quoted by the Association of Foreign Language Newspapers, the best known is Harry Pratt Judson, of the University of Chicago. It is interesting to note the many members of the faculty of the University of Chicago that I have just named do not agree with President Judson. As I said, Profs. Breasted, Butler, Carpenter, Marshall, Moore, Strong, Williston, and Young are all strongly in favor of further restriction of immigration. The same thing is true of the faculties of most of the universities. Thus not only President Lowell, but nearly all the members of the departments of history and economics at Harvard are in favor of restriction; and the same is true of the professors in the department of economics at Yale University. Prof. Fairchild, of Yale, and Prof. Jenks, of New York City University, having recently written books in favor of restrictive legislation.

In fact, nearly all of these whose names are mentioned above are in favor not only of the pending legislation, containing a reading test for immigrants, but also favor going further and raising the head tax to $10 or more, requiring immigrants to be in possession of a certain sum of money to support them while seeking employment, and raising the standard of physical and mental condition so as to exclude those of low mentality and poor physique.

But, Mr. Chairman, that which is most delightful to my own heart personally is the fact that I have this very day received from Council No. 14, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Gadsden, Ala., my own home town, a resolution indorsing my course in regard to this bill. They are poor workingmen, it is true, but they are my neighbors and my friends and men who know that for years I have been working faithfully for a cause that is nearer to them than tariff or currency or any other question before the American Congress. I would rather have from them the plaudit "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," than to be the greatest man in this or any other Congress. I am also assured that I am carrying out the will of the farmers, as well as the townspeople, for at a great farmers' meeting at Gadsden, Ala., last July, a resolution proposed by the president, Mr. O. P. Ford, of the State farmers' union, was unanimously adopted, indorsing my course in refusing the chairmanship of the Committee on Public Buildings and remaining as chairman of the great Committee on Immigration, which would have charge of this bill. I feel that, like a good soldier. I have obeyed the orders of those who have sent me here and whose commission I have borne for the past 15 years in this distinguished body.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I think it is unfair not to give us a chance to reply

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-

NETT] moves to close debate. Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to present at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. That will not be precluded by this motion, but only the debate on it will be precluded.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] move to close the debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Having been heard himself, he moves to close the debate on the paragraph?

Mr. GOOD. Has there been any debate at all on this para-

The CHAIRMAN. It has been treated as debate.
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not a fact that after the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] made a speech the Chair recognized some one on the floor, and did not the gentleman from Alabama then move to close debate? The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized no one after the gentleman from Alabama made the motion. The motion is to close debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the "gentleman from Wyoming" understood that he was recognized some time ago. The Chair surely called his name.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was disposed to recognize the gentleman from Wyoming, but just then the chairman of the committee [Mr. Burnert] asked for recognition.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there has been no discussion

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mon-DELL] has never been formally recognized. The Chair was getting ready to recognize him.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. MOORE. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama, as stated by the Chair, was that all debate close upon this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. And all amendments thereto.

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir. As the paragraph is the section, and one is cotemporaneous and coterminous and coextensive with the other, I ask if I may still offer an amendment to the

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has heretofore stated that if the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is carried it will not preclude the gentleman from Pennsylvania or anyone else from offering his amendment, but it can not be debated.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the question before the committee? The CHAIRMAN. It is the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Burnett] to close debate on this section and amendments thereto.

Mr. MONDELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it. Mr. MONDELL. I called attention some time ago to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath] was not discussing this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has considered what has been proceeding here as debate, and holds accordingly.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-NETT] moves that all debate be closed forthwith, and the gentleman from Minnesota moves to amend that by asking that debate close in 15 minutes.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bur-

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

The committee divided; and there were-ayes 46, noes 57.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. Moore and Mr. Burnett took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported-ayes 48, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question now is on the CALL RUBNETT to close The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] to close debate.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 37.
Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.
Tellers were ordered, and Mr. Burnett and Mr. Moore took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported-aves 76, noes 36.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is closed, and the Clerk will

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That the district courts of the United States are hereby invested with full and concurrent jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, arising under any of the provisions of this act. That it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney of the proper district to prosecute every such suit when brought by the United States under this act. Such prosecutions or suits may be instituted at any place in the United States at which the violation may occur or at which the person charged with such violation may be found. That no suit or proceeding for a violation of the provisions of this act shall be settled, compromised, or discontinued without the consent of the court in which it is pending, entered of record, with the reasons therefor.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amend-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Peansylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 10, strike out the words "and concurrent."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the words "and concurrent" are unnecessary and misleading, because the circuit courts of the United States have been abolished. The amendment proposes to strike out the words "and concurrent," on line 10, page 47. The words "and concurrent" imply action by the circuit courts, and are therefore meaningless.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Of course, I am not a lawyer. The exist-ing law provides that "the circuit and district courts of the United States are hereby invested with full and concurrent jurisdiction of all causes.

Mr. MOORE. That is the existing law, but that law was passed prior to the enactment of the judicial code by the Con-

Mr. GARDNER. I did not catch the gentleman's statement. Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Massachusetts has read from the existing law, of which this provision is an exact copy, implying that the circuit court would still have jurisdiction. am making the point that there is no concurrent court now, and hence the words "and concurrent" are meaningless.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I started to say that the adoption of this amendment would simply make us ridiculous. An alien is a person who is not native born, who has not acquired the rights of citizenship. Now, to say that somebody is not an alien who is an alien is a simple absurdity, and if that provision was put in there the effect of it would be that a man might hold his papers for years, go back to the old country, contract any kind of a disease, or become insane, and then upon returning have the same rights and privileges that a nativeborn citizen or a naturalized citizen would have.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from Alabama recognize the peculiar situation that might exist, where a man having come to this country and declared his intention to become a citizen, might be called back within the five-year period before he had the right to complete his citizenship?

Mr. BURNETT. Exactly, Mr. Chairman; and the law now is that that man, when he returns, has to comply with the law as it exists. It does not keep him out. It simply subjects him to the same kind of an examination that he would have if he was coming here originally. It does not expatriate him. could hardly say that a man was expatriated when he had not acquired citizenship; but at the same time if he leaves the country he comes back with the right of examination. If he is admissible, he will come in. If he is not admissible, he will be kept out just like any other alien. I think the adoption of that declaration as to what is an alien would be an absurdity, because it is absolutely in conflict with the definition of an alien as given by the courts and as understood by all the authorities.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not that compel a man to begin de novo by declaring his intention to become a citizen again unless we make such a provision in the law as is contemplated by this amendment?

Mr. BURNETT. It would not keep him out. It would simply say that that man should come in like anybody else.

Mr. MADDEN. It would defer the time five years longer within which he could become a citizen.

Mr. BURNETT. It would not do that at all. That would not be the legal effect of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I think it would.
Mr. BURNETT. The result of it will be that the existing law will remain unchanged in that respect. It is for the purpose of getting around any confusion as to an immigrant alien and a nonimmigrant alien. I am opposed to the amendment. I hope it will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN, The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That for the preservation of the peace and in order that arrests may be made for crimes under the laws of the States and Territories of the United States where the various immigrant stations are located, the officers in charge of such stations, as occasion may require, shall admit therein the proper State and municipal officers charged with the enforcement of such laws, and for the purpose of this section the jurisdiction of such officers and of the local courts shall extend over such stations.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I also ask the attention of the chairman of the com-Just before this unfortunate dispute arose we passed section 24, pertaining to the enforcement of the contract-labor law. An appropriation of $50,000 was provided, and I wanted to offer an amendment to increase it to $60,000, but could not, because you closed debate on the other side. I now ask whether the department has asked for more than $50,000 for the purpose of investigating violations of the contract-labor law?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think so; it has never been called to my attention.

Mr. MOORE. Then I bring to the attention of the committee the urgent report of the Commissioner General of Immigration. My judgment is that if we give more money to the Commissioner General it would go a great way toward suppressing improper

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The committee is in disorder; it sounds like a flock of geese over here. And I think the worst offender is the chairman of the committee and his associate. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Commissioner General, which is not yet published, gives a remarkable statement in regard to the finances of the bureau. It is not generally known that in 20 years, during the operation of the Bureau of Immigration, there has been collected from the immigrants about $37,000,000, and the expenditures have not greatly exceeded $28,000,000. That leaves a net balance, as the result of the 20 years' operation of the bureau, of over $8,000,000. This came from the pockets of the immigrants by way of head tax. If a little of this $8,000,000, which now goes into the General Treasury and is expended for general purposes, is applied to the purpose of administration in the Immigration Bureau and the Department of Labor, there might be less complaint about the admission of undesirable immigrants. What we need is a closer inspection at the ports of entry and along the border lines, and we ought to have more thorough medical inspection at some of the larger ports.

Mr. SABATH. Did I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask unanimous consent to go back to section 24?

Mr. MOORE. No; I could not get an opportunity to offer the amendment, and I do not care to go back unless the chairman of the committee will consent. If he would consent, I would move to increase the appropriation from fifty to sixty, thousand dollars.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that this appropriation should be increased. We are all against contract labor. I am of the opinion that the appropriation in this bill does not give the Secretary of Labor the working force that he ought to have to enforce this particular section pertaining to contract labor. Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.
Mr. MOORE. For the year ending June 30 last we collected in head tax from these immigrants $4,800,000, and we expended for the purposes of the bureau $2,800,000, leaving approximately $2,000,000 to the credit of the immigrants, or to the immigrant fund, which has gone into the general fund of the United States.

Mr. SABATH. I agree with the gentleman that it should not be the policy of our Government to make money out of these unfortunate people, and I am of the opinion that this large sum of money that has been collected should have been used to provide better accommodations and take better care of the immigrants. I am also of the opinion that it is not the intention of the House that we should impose a head tax for the purpose of revenue or for financial benefit, and for that reason I am going to ask permission of the chairman of the committee, or ask unanimous consent, to amend the section, and instead of appropriating $50,000 increase it to at least $75,000.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, this $50,000 is merely for the purpose of employing agents and agencies to investigate violations of the contract-labor law. It is not for inspectors; it is not for patrols along the borders; it is not for general inspectors all over the country, but for this particular line of We have had no request from the Commissioner business. General of Immigration or from the Secretary of Labor asking that this amount be increased, and my judgment is that they have not used the maximum amount that is already allowed.

Therefore, although I desire to be courteous to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore], who is always courteous himself, I wish he would withhold his request, and if there is any necessity for it I will aid him in securing the additional appropriation in the Senate. I am of the opinion that there is no demand for it. This is an important line of investigation; it is one of the most serious violations in the whole country. the same time I believe the amount allowed here is sufficient unless the Secretary of Labor or the Commissioner General of Immigration would advise us differently, and therefore I hope the gentleman will not insist on recurring to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Byens of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following

H. R. 10084. An act to authorize the changing of the names of the steamships Buckman and Watson,

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That any person who knowingly aids or assists any anarchist or any person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government or all forms of law, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entering and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, to enter the United States, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such anarchist or person aforesaid to enter therein, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Mr. Chairman, I. have a committee amend-

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment which I desire to offer to that section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, line 10, after the word "both," add a new sentence as thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to reach the amendment which we offered in previous portions of the bill excluding and making deportable those who advocate the destruction of property. It is a felony on the part of those who aid anarchists to enter this country in violation of the law, and the committee did not think it was right to make a felony of the offense of aiding one who advocates the unlawful destruction of property to enter, and hence have made it a misdemeanor, with a large discretion in the court or the jury trying the same as to the penalty imposed. In other words, those who aid in bringing in those who advocate or teach the destruction of property are guilty of a misdemeanor.

Those who aid an anarchist to enter are guilty of a felony.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama suggests that this is a committee amendment. I have no recollection that any such committee amendment was offered, and I would like to have the amendment again reported.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the committee did take this up and unanimously instructed the chairman to re-

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I was not present at that time, but I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 38. That this act, except as otherwise provided in section 3, shall take effect and be enforced from and after July 1, 1914. The act of March 26, 1910, amending the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; the act of March 3, 1903, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; and all other acts and parts o. acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, nor to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, or the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," and amendments thereto: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution, suit, action, or proceedings brought, or any act, thing, or matter, civil or criminal, done or existing at the time of the taking effect of this act, except as mentioned in the last provise of section 19 hereof; but as to all such prosecutions, suits, actions, proceedings, acts, things, or matters, the laws or parts of laws repealed or amended by this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

With the following committee amendment:

With the following committee amendment:

Page 56, line 18, strike out the word "thirteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fourteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, that is a committee amendment, and is just changing the time when the act shall go into effect, from 1913 to 1914.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman also that it might be a little better in line 17 to strike out the word "from" and insert in lieu thereof the word "on," making the act take effect with the beginning of the fiscal year, though I do not know that it makes any great difference.

Mr. BURNETT. I think the suggestion is a wise one. The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on section 38.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the Record resolutions passed by the State Federation of Labor of the State of Washington and by the Everett Typographical Union. The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Whereas on December 15, 1913, Mr. JOHN L. BURNETT, chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on Immigration, reported the immigration bill, H. R. 6060, to the House and urged its early consideration and speedy passage; and

Whereas this bill contains the following restriction:

"That after four months from the approval of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons:

"All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable to read, who can not read the English language or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien or any alien theretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any clitzen of the United States may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of ege, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not, and such relative shall be permitted to enter. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip (prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Labor) in such language or dialect "; and Whereas this section of the act is the literacy test that the American Pederation of Labor has urged Congress to enact for many years. In the last Congress it was passed by both Houses and vetoed by President Tatt. The Senatz took it up and passed it over Mr. Tatt's veto by a vote of 72 to 18, the House vote being 213 to 114. A change of 5 votes in the House would have overridden the veto and placed the literacy test for incoming aliens upon the statute books during that Congress; and
Whereas protests against the enactment of the literacy test are being received by Congressmen, but the general opinion is that they are inspired by, and principally emanate from, steamship agencies interested in having a full supply of helpless lamigrants, who, because of their necessities, must work cheaply; and

E. P. MARSH, Everett Typographical Union, No. 419.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the Record was granted to Mr. Moore, Mr. Goldfogle, Mr. Raker, Mr. Cantor, Mr. Reilly of Connecticut, Mr. Sisson, Mr. Lobeck, Mr. Donohoe, Mr. Dyer, Mr. Austin, Mr. Steenerson, Mr. Falconer, Mr. Manahan, Mr. Morin, Mr. Williams, Mr. Weaver, Mr. Burnett, Mr. Connelly of Kansas, and Mr. AIKEN.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 56, line 17, strike out the word "from" and insert the word "on."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revert to section 7, which was passed without prejudice, for the purpose of offering an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and which I have submitted to the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to section 7 in order to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Is there objection? There was no objection,

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 12, after the word "representation," insert "or by the payment of any commissions or the allowance of any rebates to an alien or by any transportation company to another transportation company participating in the transportation of any alien out of the fare of such alien."

Mr. BURNETT. That amendment, Mr. Chairman, has been submitted to several of us, who investigated it, and it seems to be a proper amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass. I believe the rule provides for the previous question being ordered at once,

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that there are two mistakes, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 15, strike out "and persons who have been insane within five years."

The CHAIRMAN. The word "previous" should also be stricken out.

Mr. BURNETT. That should be stricken out.
The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Page 10, line 22, after the word "in," insert the words "the contract labor or reading test provision of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The words "of this act" should be

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill and the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hay, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6060 and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to recommit— The SPEAKER. That time has not arrived yet. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to. The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the rule covers it or not, and if not I desire to move the previous question on the motion.

The rule covers it. The SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The rule covers it. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, with instructions to strike out the following, and report forthwith:

"That after four months from the approval of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit:

"All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any citizen of the United States, may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relative shall be permitted to enter. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with slips of uniform size, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plainly legible type in the various languages and dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect, in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect. No two aliens coming in the same vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation shall be tested with the same slip. That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution; all aliens in transit through the United States; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory."

Mr. SABATH. That is the educational test; that is all. The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit. Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Gold-FOGLE] demands the year and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

GOOD ROADS.

Ir. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report and resolu-

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Pou, from the Committee on Rules, offered the following report (H. Rept. 220):

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 382) providing for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, having had the same under consideration, beg to report the following substitute in lieu thereof and recommend its adoption:

Resolution (H. Res. 382) providing for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 11686) empowering the United States, in certain cases to aid the States and civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads, and for other purposes.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider the bill (H. R. 11686) providing that the United States shall, in certain cases, aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof: In the construction and maintenance of rural post roads; that there may be seven hours' general debate on said bill, which said general debate shall be had from 8 o'clock p. m. on this day and between said hours on each succeeding day, except Calendar Wednesday, until said general debate has been concluded; that on the next day thereafter, other than either Monday or Calendar Wednesday, and immediately after reading the Journal, said bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule, and be the standing order of the House until disposed of.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this substitute, which has been

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this substitute, which has been reported by the Committee on Rules for the original resolution, provides for seven hours' debate on what is known as the socalled road bill, with which I presume all of the Members of the House are more or less familiar. I do not care to discuss the rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

question?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. MANN. Is it, as I understand it, the intention to have debate to-night? That is what the rule says.

Mr. POU. That would be in accordance with the rule.

Mr. MANN. We have transferred Calendar Wednesday until to-morrow. I would like to have an expression from the has the right of Calendar Wednesday. I take it that it would be so construed?

The SPEAKER.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention under this rule to proceed with the consideration of the bill for amendment before you finish general debate?

Mr. POU. I think not. Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to know. The SPEAKER. The rule itself provides that after seven hours' debate it shall be taken up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. The rule provides that immediately after the adoption of the rule it shall be in order to call up the bill.

The SPEAKER. But it can only be called up under the rule for general debate, which in that case means 8 o'clock to-night or 8 o'clock to-morrow night.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, the rule itself is explicit, but in order that there may be no misunderstanding about it it may be considered that to-morrow stands for Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker has already ruled that.
Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the debate is to begin to-night, but will not continue to-morrow night under the terms of the rule?

The SPEAKER. By a previous order of the House, to-morrow will be considered to be Calendar Wednesday, and the House will meet at 11 o'clock. The Chair does not think anybody would want to come back here to-morrow night at 8 o'clock after spending seven hours or perhaps eight hours here during the day.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the order apply to to-night? Do

Members want to come back here to-night?

The SPEAKER. Why, no. We did not begin at 11 o'clock to-day.

Mr. BURLAND. Calendar Wednesday. Mr. BORLAND. The rule says that it shall not apply to

The SPEAKER. Yes. Mr. BORLAND. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, although we have made the business of Calendar Wednesday in order to-morrow

The SPEAKER. As far as the Chair is concerned to-morrow will be Calendar Wednesday. That is the way the rule is construed by the Chair.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Then let us have a vote on the resolution. The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BUREAU OF LABOR SAFETY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair promised to recognize the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, there is a bill pending in this House in which Robert Bremner is intensely interested. It relates to a subject to which he has devoted years of his life. He is now in a very critical state. In fact, the end is likely to come at any minute. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 10735.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts the request for unanimous consent, he will ask leave to make a short statement,

Since the creation of the Unanimous Consent Calendar the Chair has been very careful to try to enforce it, but in a few instances, where there was an emergency, the Chair has taken the responsibility of recognizing Members outside of that; and under the peculiar circumstances of this case, without setting any precedent or having it relied on as a precedent, the Chair, after consultation with the majority and minority leaders and some other gentlemen, has recognized the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Walsh] to make this request for unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the bill? The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 10735) to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor, as follows:

to-morrow. I would like to have an expression from the Speaker on that, if I might.

Mr. POU. The resolution expressly excepts Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. I understand the resolution expressly excepts Calendar Wednesday and was undoubtedly designed for to-morrow, which is Thursday, which has the right of Calendar Wednesday. It is not itself Calendar Wednesday, although it study of all phases of the subject of vocational diseases, and to make public the results of such investigation, examination, and study from time to time. It shall also be the province and duty of such bureau, under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, to gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning the use of labor safety plans and devices and vocational diseases in the industries of the United States and elsewhere.

Sec. 2. That there shall be erected a museum of sufficient size and capacity, with grounds thereto annexed, in and upon which shall be exhibited approved devices for the safeguarding of machinery, the protection of employees from injury, the lessening of dangerous conditions which may exist in any industrial enterprise, and the methods of lessening, preventing, and controlling industrial diseases. All such appliances, devices, and arrangements may be exhibited at rest or in motion, as may best serve the purposes of such exhibit. That in addition to the museum hereinbefore referred to and in connection therewith there shall be established a laboratory, wherein may be examined and tested the relative efficiency of types of guards or other devices for the protection of machinery calculated to safeguard the employee or the general public from injury or industrial disease.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker. Listening, as best I could, to the reading of the bill by the Clerk, it appears to be very comprehensive in its language; and while I regret the circumstances under which the bill comes up, and am very fond of the Member who is the author of the bill, and while my sympathies are with him, and the bill may be all right, yet under the circumstances I feel that I must object to a bill, involving as much as this bill does, being considered in this way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] objects.

MINE-RESCUE STATION-CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 3988 was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. It provides for the construction of a mine-rescue station, and should have gone to the Committee on Public Buildings and I ask unanimous consent that the reference may be Grounds. changed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from further consideration of H. R. 3988, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the immigration bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on the immigration bill. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

OUDER OF BUSINESS. -

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, the rule which has just been adopted in regard to the good roads bill requires that we proceed to-night at 8 o'clock with the general debate. After talking with a number of Members who have addressed the House to-day, I have been requested to ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the good roads bill be postponed until 8 o'clock on Friday night instead of going on to-night. I therefore make that request. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 107 and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider Senate joint resolution 107, relating to the Lincoln Memorial. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution 107, relating to supervision of the Lincoln Memorial.

Resolved, etc., That in the exercise of its control and direction for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial, authorized by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911, the commission created by said act shall designate to perform the duty of special resident commissioner to represent the commission in the oversight of the work, the Hon. Joseph C. S. Blackburn, recently appointed a member of the Lincoln Memorial Commission, as the successor to the Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, deceased; and for the special service of the member so designated he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum out of the appropriations for the construction of such memorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not a fact that when the special resident commissionship was created employment to the late and then former Senator Cullom, of Illinois, with the implied obligation on the part of the gentleman who secured the employment that there was no necessity for such commissioner, but that it would be a graceful act on the part of Congress to give this employment to that gentleman, who unfortunately then, as everyone knew, had but a short time to live? I want to ask the gentleman further if there is any useful work to be performed by this commissioner which could not be performed by the commissioners created in the bill for the general commission?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think a part of the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey is correct—that it was a very graceful compliment and a proper one to the late Senator Cullom. I do not think it is accurate to say that there was nothing for him to do or nothing he was prepared to do or did, just as I now think there is a proper work to be performed by the commissioner who has been appointed to succeed the late Senator Cullom, former Senator Blackburn. Of course any work could be done by some one else. Doubtless if no one was designated the work would be done, but I do not think it is a matter that has no justification. I believe it is a proper appointment that the President has made, and it is proper that Congress should make provision as to Mr. Blackburn, as provision was made for Senator Cullom.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. This is for the purpose of fixing Mr. Blackburn's compensation?

Mr. SHERLEY. At the same rate that was paid Mr. Cullom. Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Blackburn was appointed a member of the commission?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; the same as was Mr. Cullom. Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Cullom was made a resident commissioner's

Mr. SHERLEY. By act of Congress, in the exact language of the resolution now before the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not a fact that since the late Senator Cullom was made resident commissioner and was supposed to be clothed with the power to make contracts, the Attorney General has ruled that the commission itself has no power to make contracts; that that power is in the Secretary of War; and the Secretary of War in pursuance of that ruling has designated Maj. Harts as supervisor of the construction?

Mr. SHERLEY. Touching the contracts the gentleman is right; but it was not contemplated, in my judgment, that Senator Cullom should perform the duty of seeing that the contracts were entered into. He was to be the resident commisstioner. There will of necessity be a great many things engaging the attention of the resident commissioner in connection with the construction of that great memorial.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Outside of what the architect will be able to attend to?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there are many things that will come up outside of the architect's duty.

Mr. BORLAND. There is not only the architect but the architect's representative, who will supervise the construction.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suppose it is true that you could dispense with the members of the commission, but it seemed fit to the author of the resolution and to the Senate, where it passed unanimously, and it seems fit to me that this resolution should go through, and that former Senator Blackburn should be given the position. I believe he will more than justify by his services the action taken by Congress.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. Senator Cullom, up to the time he became physically unable to go to his office, was actively engaged in the work that it is proposed to substitute former Senator Blackburn to do. I hope that there will be no objection to considering this joint resolution, and that it will pass unanimously.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not yield to any man in my admiration for the public services of Senator Blackburn in the Congress of the United States, and ac civil governor of the Canal Zone, and as member of the first commission, but clearly that position of resident commissioner was created as a personal compliment to Senator Cullom. The work of planning the memorial was done by the Fine Arts Commission and the architects. The work of letting the contracts was supposed to be handled in an administrative way by Senator Cullom and by the commission, but the decision of the Attorney General has actually taken away from the commission that power and provided that the Secretary of War must, in the last analysis, pass on the contracts, aid—whatever the former duties of Senator Cullom may have been—that has made it was created for the sole and express purpose of giving it necessary under the law for the Secretary of War to designate some one there as the administrative officer and supervising architect of that building.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is somewhat in error. Mr. BORLAND. He has designated very properly an engineer officer of the Army. I do not think he ought to have gone outside and designated anybody and taken money out of this fund to pay him. He has designated an Army officer, who is the Superintendent of Public Buldings and Grounds in the District of Columbia, and he ought not to cost the Government an additional cent. He ought to do that work as a part of his duty as Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and there is absolutely no occasion for continuing this position, Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that while it is true that the Department of Justice has held that the Secretary of War was not a ministerial officer only but should exercise judgment as to letting the contracts, there are many matters besides that which it will be the duty of the commission to consider. I think it is not unfitting that Congress should have, in a sense, a representative directly of its choosing, as it had in the person of former Senator Cullom. I am quite sure that nothing could be more fitting than that in connection with the memorial to the most distinguished of all Kentuckians Congress should now designate a very distinguished Kentuckian, a former Senator from that State, to be its representative in the construction of such memorial. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the high degree of sentiment that attaches to that, but we have had too many expensive commissions and the commissions do not do the work, and nothing has made it clearer that commissions are utterly useless and extravagant than the recent decision of the Attorney General.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will remember that this is not an expensive commission. I am quite sure it will not entail on the Government any additional expense. I do think that a resident commissioner who will spend his time in seeing that the work is properly forwarded will earn the salary which is purposed to be paid to him out of the fund for the erection of this memorial. I trust the gentleman may permit the matter to come before the House for consideration. Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is a fact, is it not, that whenever there was occasion for any business of importance to be transacted in relation to letting a contract or other affairs relating to this Lincoln Memorial there have been meetings of the whole commission?

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, there are meetings of the whole commission, of course.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Showing that no business will be transacted of any importance without a meeting of the commission?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think that follows.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND | has said, there is the architect; there is the Army engineer actively and diligently and professionally capable of carrying on this work. If in view of that fact the gentleman from Kentucky thinks that it is proper that the House as a matter of sentiment purely should continue this $5,000 a year commission, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. Speaker, I would not have asked Mr. SHERLEY. unanimous consent if I did not think it was a proper resolution to pass the House. I am quite sure, as I have undertaken to say in several instances, that the resident commissioner will justify the payment to him of this compensation. I am quite sure that he himself would not want to be a recipient of it if he did not feel that he would render services entitling him to it, and I should not ask the House to pass this resolution if I did not think it was a proper one.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is aware of the fact that unfortunately, very unfortunately, since the creation of this special resident commissioner he has, of course, been unable to perform any service whatever?

I do not think anyone in the House objected to the fact that he received this salary, although when the House was asked to give this salary the statement was made upon the floor here that he was a man who absolutely required this compensation for his livelihood. I am glad to see, however, the gentleman left an estate of $100,000.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kentucky permit an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will. Mr. COOPER. If ex-Senator Blackburn becomes a member of the commission, he will be the only ex-Confederate soldier on that commission, will he not?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true.

Mr. COOPER. If I may be permitted to say, I think it would be a most admirable thing to have an ex-Confederate soldier on the commission having to do with the construction of this magnificent monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman he is on the commission. He is an ex-Confederate soldier already on the commission, and the question now under consideration is. Shall he be paid; and if so, for what services? That is the question under discussion.

Mr. COOPER. I thought the question was, Shall he be paid for these services

Mr. BORLAND. For what services?

Mr. COOPER. For the same services which Senator Cullom performed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is an error on the part of gentlemen to assume that Senator Cullom did not have any duties to perform or did not perform any duties. On the contrary, he had quite a number of duties to perform and gave as much time to it as he was able to give. I know that on several occasions he did me the honor to consult me in reference to matters before the commission in reference to the Lincoln Memorial, and I know that he did give it considerable time up to a very recent period.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will my friend permit me to say I had occasion with a number of gentlemen to go before that commission on two different occasions and Senator Cullom was taking a very active part in the deliberations of that commission, and left work unfinished that, as far as I am informed, ex-Senator Blackburn will take up.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is unquestionably true a commission such as this will be better equipped by having one resident commissioner on the ground, and he will be to some extent, so far as the commission is concerned when it meets, the eves and ears of that commission to bring to their attention for dis-cussion and settlement various questions that an outsider, one who is not a member of the commission, would not bring before the commission. In other words, he, being one of the commissioners, would be in a position that would enable him to render valuable aid and assistance to the commission as such, being a member of that commission.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman think that all that can be done by the engineer officer?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman, in 21 years' experience as a legislator here and at home I pay a great deal more attention, because there is more freedom of debate and of intercourse, to members of a committee of which I am a member when we go to discuss the final settlement of questions involving any work or legislation or policy; and I think the gentleman on consideration will conclude there is work for a resident commissioner to do, and I know of no one in all this country who is better qualified or better equipped from that standpoint than Joseph Blackburn, of Kentucky. If the gentleman wants to put it solely on the ground of sentiment, which I do not do, I will say that I hope sentiment will never perish from the face of the earth. If it does, this will be a very poor world, indeed.
Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Is there objection? The SPEAKER.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I object.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] objects, and that is the end of it.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Pensions is hereby discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12179) to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Army and Navy medal-of-honor honor roll," and for other purposes, and the same is hereby referred to the Committee on Invalid

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, whose proposition is that? Is it a bill in reference to Civil War veterans or is it an Army and Navy roll of honor generally?

The SPEAKER. It is to establish a roll of the soldiers of both armies during the Civil War.

Mr. MANN. Just during the Civil War?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is my understanding of it. Chair has forgotten who has charge of this matter. It is a question of reference. Evidently it went to the wrong pension committee by some kind of an oversight. The bill provides for printing a roster of the officers and sailors of the Civil War, on both sides.

Mr. MANN. It belongs really to the Committee on Military Affairs, then.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is rather inclined to think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is right. We will let the matter go over until the morning, when we can have the bill before us.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. RIORDAN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Henrietta Sherman, H. Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the election of Hon. James M. Gudger, Jr., of North Carolina, to be chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, to fill a vacancy caused by the death of the late Representative

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Under-WOOD] moves the election of Hon. James M. Gudger, Jr., as chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department in lieu of the late Representative PEPPER,

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House, under its previous order (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.), adjourned until Thursday, February 5, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PARCEL POST ON STAR ROUTES.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the parcel post has caused injury to be done to some of the carriers on rural routes in my State. I have a very short article here from the Pocatello Tribune, together with a letter from one of the contractors, Mr. Hansen, I will ask that they be read into the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Idaho wish to have them referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads? Mr. BRADY. That reference may be made after they have been read.

Mr. SMOOT. They are in the shape of a petition?

Mr. BRADY. The communications are in the form of a petition.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering, that being the case, whether they might not be referred without encumbering the RECORD with them. Does the Senator wish to have them printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BRADY. I should like to have them read into the RECORD at this time, and then referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the communications? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

MACKAY & CENTRAL IDAHO STAGE Co. (LTD.), Mackay, Idaho, January 31, 1914.

Mackay & Central Idaho Stage Co. (Ltd.),
Mackay, Idaho, January 31, 1914.

Hon. James H. Brady,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator: I have seen by the paper that you were interested in the star-route mail service, and as I am one of them and have been in the business for the past 15 years and I am trying to get a new contract, if possible, without too much risk, but under the present conditions of the parcel-post business a person does not know what to do, as you will see from the clipping inclosed, which will give you some idea of the rate conditions here.

For example, let us take the rate from Mackay to Bonanza, a distance of 118 miles, at the rate by parcel post of $1.08 per hundred; by slow freight during summer months the rate is $1.25 per hundred, making a difference of 17 cents per hundred. During the winter months the rate by slow freight is $2 per hundred, so you will readily see that if business improves, which it no doubt will, the mail contractor will be unable to handle the same, except by so doing at an enormous loss. The man who handles slow freight is at a very trifling expense compared to a mail contractor, as the mail must go through regardless of expense and the slow freighter can take his time; the slow freighter employs no help.

I do not think the department is aware of the conditions as they exist in a mountainous country, as we have waterspouts to contend with in the summer months and snowslides and blizzards in the wintertime, to say nothing of excessive cold.

Allow me to call your attention to the contractors on the routes between Boise and Idaho City, and Mountain Howe and Rocky Bar. When the contractor of the Boise-Idaho City took the contract, his bid was for $7.68 per trip; parcel post so increased the mail and diminished the express that he was forced to give up his contract, and his bondsmen, who are now operating the line, are doing so at the cost of $46 per day. The same facts are true in the case of the Mountain Home contractor.

Thanking you for this and past favors, I remain, Yours, very truly,

C. V. HANSEN.

HANDED HIM ORE FOR PARCEL POST.

HANDED HIM ORE FOR PARCEL FOST.

After throwing up his hands in despair and calling for aid, when three carloads of ore, in 50-pound packages, shipped by parcel post, were handed him to deliver recently, the contractor who handles the mail between Stites and Elk City, Idaho, is expected to succumb when he begins to receive from Spokane a 50,000-pound parcel-post shipment of groceries over the same route. Stites is on the railroad and Elk City is not, and the parcel-post shipments are carried 60 miles by a Government mail carrier between the two points. He has been using light wagons but may have to engage a battery of automobile freighters if business picks up. The grocery shipment comprises one thousand 50-pound packages, and goes at the rate of 54 cents for 50 pounds. To top it off, it is understood the Elk City retailer expects to have dry goods and hardware supplies shipped in by parcel post from Spokane.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communications will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in line 8, after the word "of," to strike out "providing and administering remedies for hog cholera" and insert "the investigation, treatment, and eradication of hog cholera: Provided, however, That not less than $50,000 of said sum shall be available for expenditure in carrying on examinations and inspections authorized by the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., pp. 832, 833), regulating the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, shipment, and importation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for the enforcement of the provisions, including detection of violations, of said act and the regulations made thereunder," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, to be expended, by and under his direction, for the purpose of the investigation, treatment, and eradication of hog cholera: Provided, however, That not less than $50,000 of said sum shall be available for expenditure in carrying on examinations and inspections authorized by the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., pp. 832, 833), regulating the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, shipment, and importation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for the enforcement of the provisions, including detection of violations, of said act and the regulations made thereunder.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I hope this bill appropriating $500,000 for the prevention of hog cholera will be passed without delay. Promptness is required in acting on it. If we wait until the Agricultural appropriation bill is presented and passed, the opportunity to stay the ravages of the disease may be lost.

In this connection I should like to address the Senate briefly on the preventable waste in this country. Very few realize the aggregate loss to the people of the United States from this cause. It is characteristic of our country that everything is on an enormous scale, and in nothing is that enormous scale quite so notable as in losses which for the most part might be prevented by the exercise of care and improved methods. These losses bear with unusual weight upon agriculture.

In the report of the National Conservation Commission, submitted in January, 1909, which contains the most complete sta-tistics upon this subject, it is stated that the direct and indirect losses from fire in the United States during the year 1907 approximated $450,000,000, nearly one-half the cost of new construction. A comparison of the standard of construction and fire losses in the larger European countries shows that of this loss four-fifths, or an average of $1,000,000 per day, could have been prevented.

The loss from floods in the same year was estimated at $238,000,000. In the year 1913 the flood loss was vastly greater, while the losses from fire, it is gratifying to note, were diminished nearly one-half.

In treating of agriculture the report of the commission, on page 81, states that-

Aside from careless or ignorant farming and such hostile climatic conditions as storms and droughts, the most serious enemies to crops are noxious insects and mammals.

The chief insect enemies of the grains are the corn-root worm, the chinch bug, the Hessian fly, plant lice, grasshoppers, cutworms, and army worms. The worst enemy of cotton is the boil weevil. Fruits are injured chiefly by the codling moth and the San Jose scale, The Bureau of Entomology estimates that the annual damage by noxious insects to growing crops, fruit trees, and grain in storage is no less than $655,000,000. This total includes the cost of preventive measures which greatly reduce the aggregate loss.

The average yearly loss to animal products from files, ticks, and other insects is estimated at $267,000,000. This does not include the enormous loss of human life and the cost of disease due to house flies, mosquitoes, fleas, and other germ-carrying insects—a loss much greater than that suffered by the live stock and their products.

The Biological Survey estimates that the damage to live stock and crops by wolves, rats, mice, and other mammals averages over $100,000,000 yearly.

The average annual loss to stock by disease during the preceding five years was: Among horses, 1.8 per cent; among cattle, 2 per cent; among sheep, 2.2 per cent; and among swine, 5.1 per cent.

The total annual losses to the agriculture of the country, including live stock, animal products, and grain in storage, from insects, mammals, and disease was estimated at $1,142,000,000, or one-sixth of the total production. Texas fever among cattle caused a loss of $40,000,000. The estimated loss from hog cholera was $54,000,000 in a single year. Unfortunately the loss from hog cholera has greatly increased, and the estimate given was unquestionably much too small.

While the conservation of human life and health should always be the first consideration, these increasing injuries to the farming industry of the country demand immediate and thorough attention, and among them all the eradication of hog cholera is the most pressing.

It is hardly necessary to say that the prosperity of the farmer and the maintenance and increase of farming products are objects of universal interest. This is not a mere State or a local but a national problem.

The food products of one State are the food supplies of another. Grain and live stock are objects of interstate commerce and a proper subject for national appropriation. Whatever may be the theory as to the connection between the State governments and the National Government, appropriations have been made on a very large scale for the extermination of the boll weevil, the gypsy moth, and for a number of animal and plant diseases

With the consent of the Senate, I will include a brief statement of some of these derived from the last agricultural appropriation bill:

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scables in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and the alteration of buildings thereon, the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals, $654.000: Provided, That of this sum not less than $75.000 shall be set aside for demonstrating the best method of preventing and eradicating hog cholera.

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $325,000.

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production, and the study of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, $104,925: Provided, That not less than $30,000 shall be set aside for the study of corn improvement and methods of corn production.

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

For investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts, $45,000.

For investigations of insects affecting cereal and forage plants, including insects affecting wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, alfalfa, clover, etc., $90,000, of which amount not to exceed $10,000 shall be expended for the investigation of the range caterpillar.

For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, etc., and the Argentine ant, $50,000.

For investigations of insects affecting forests, $44,750.

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, including insects affecting the potato, sugar beet, cabbage, onion, tomato, beans, peas, etc., and insects affecting stored products, $35,000.

For investigations in bee culture, $15,000.

For investigations of insects affecting tropical and subtropical fruits, including insects affecting the orange, lemon, grapefruit, mango, etc., $21,500.

For investigations of the Mediterranean fly in the United States, its Territories and possessions, $35,000.

For investigations of miscellaneous insects, including the study of insects affecting the health of man and domestic animals, household insects, the importation and exchange of useful insects, and experiments with insecticides and insecticide machinery, $45,000.

In all, for general expenses, $331,250.

Preventing spread of moths: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continued spread of the gypsy and brown-tail moths by establishing and maintaining a quarantine against further spread in such manner as he shall deem best, in cooperation with the authorities of the different States concerned and with the several State experiment stations, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $300,000.

I do not wish to take further time, but I trust the bill will pass immediately, because it is of the utmost urgency to the agricultural States in which hogs are raised. It is also especially urgent that action be taken during the colder weather of the winter when remedial action will be more effective.

It should not be forgotten that there is a close connection between the raising of hogs and that of cattle. The cattle industry and the profits therefrom are dependent in a considerable degree upon the raising of hogs. Thus the prevention of hog cholera will have a very appreciable effect in increasing the quantity of both these varieties of meat.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, relative to the bill which is now

Mr. Brady. Mr. President, relative to the bill which is now before us for consideration, we have had this matter before the Committee on Agriculture for some time. Several bills were presented. This last week we called before us Mr. Galloway, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and discussed the matter very thoroughly with him. He made a statement to the effect that the department is thoroughly satisfied that hog cholera can be eradicated and the disease in almost every case prevented by proper scientific treatment and he stated that prevented by proper scientific treatment, and he stated that action should be taken at an early date when the disease is known to be in a community.

Various appropriations were asked for, $500,000, $750,000, and Various appropriations were asked for, $500,000, $750,000, and I believe $1,000,000, but it was unanimously agreed that $500,000 spent now would be of as much benefit to the farmers of the country as $2,000,000 spent in July.

Therefore it was decided by the committee to ask for this smaller appropriation, so that it could be used immediately, and the Agricultural Department be in a position to commence the work of assisting the farmers throughout the country as early as March. The measure has been ably discussed and no serious objection has been made to its passage.

A great many statistics have been presented showing the . great loss to the farmers of the country by the ravages of hog cholera; my own State of Idaho suffered an enormous loss in 1913 on account of this disease.

I noticed a map on the wall of the Senate Chamber the other day, when the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. Kenyon] was delivering his address on this subject. He stated there were something over 7,000 hogs lost in 1912 in the State of Idaho, valued, I believe, at something over $100,000. That was quite true for the year 1912, but the hog cholera broke out in my State in 1913, and the disease caused a loss of hogs in that State State in 1913, and the disease caused a loss of hogs in that State amounting to over $1,500,000. I believe that the Agricultural Department and the State, working in cooperation against the disease, can do a great deal to prevent further loss not only in my State but in the Nation. For that reason the committee decided to ask for this small appropriation at this time, with the hope that the Senate would give the bill immediate and favorable consideration. The Agricultural Department is doing splendid work along these lines, and with this appropriation made will be able to do an improper amount of good before the made will be able to do an immense amount of good before the general appropriation is available in July. For these reasons I hope there will be no objection to the immediate consideration and passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a report.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.
The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill appropriating funds for the purpose of the investigation, treatment, and eradication of hog cholera."

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN FLORIDA.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Fisheries, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1899) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Florida, and I submit a report (No. 221) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Florida, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce; and provides that before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance with this act, the State of Florida, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish-cultural work and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding; and provides further, that the operations of said fish-cultural station may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to zemain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said fishcultural station.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that a letter from the Department of Commerce in reference to this matter may be read. It is brief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, October 24, 1913.

Hon. J. R. THORNTON, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Senators: Referring to your letter of the 20th Instant, transmitting a copy of Senate bill 1899, for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in Florida, the department makes the following statement and recommendation:

It would appear to be very appropriate and desirable for this department to have a fish-cultural station at some suitable point in Florida where both migratory and pond fishes could be handled for the purpose of keeping up the supply in the waters of Florida and of contiguous States. Among the migratory fishes of great economic importance which may be cultivated to advantage in Florida are shad and sturgeon, while the local races of black bass, sunfish, crapple, etc., are among the largest and best in the country.

The form of this bill meets with the entire approval of the department, and its passage is strongly recommended.

Very truly, yours,

E. F. Sweet, Acting Secretary.

E. F. SWEET, Acting Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida whether there is any amendment suggested by the committee to the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no amendment reported. bill is reported precisely as recommended by the department.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that the bill is not in the usual form of bills providing for the establishment of fish-cultural stations within the different States, and I was wondering why there should be a difference in a bill for the establishment of such a station in the State of Florida and for those in other States

I will also state to the Senator from Florida that the amount of the appropriation is twice as much as is generally allowed for the establishment of a fish-cultural station.

Mr. FLETCHER. This appropriation covers the site as well as all other provisions for this fish-cultural station. The form of the bill is the form approved by the department. I do not know in what respect it differs from any similar bill, but I repeat that it is precisely in the form the department desires it shall be.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, I will state that the Department of Commerce sent a letter to the committee setting out that the appropriations heretofore provided in bills which have been passed have been entirely inadequate for the construction of such fish hatcheries as should be constructed, and they recommended that the amount of the appropriation should be increased, and the committee have accepted their suggestion.

In reference to the form of the bill, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Utah-I did not notice the reading of the first part of the bill-that I think it, with the change suggested by the department, is in exactly the form in which similar bills have heretofore passed the Senate. The bill was introduced to meet the suggestions of the department. Therefore no amendment was necessary to make it conform with bills heretofore passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I consulted with the department before introducing the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that the Senator from Florida had not done so. What I said was that the wording of the bill is so different from that of other bills establishing fish-cultural stations in other States that I wondered what was the reason for it. This bill provides that there shall be an act of the Legislature of Florida in relation to the culture of fish or the authorization of the Government of the United States to propagate fish within the State. No other bill which we have passed here has had any such requirement as that, and, I repeat, I wondered why it was so framed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is mistaken in that. During the last two years such a provision has been inserted in every bill which has passed the Senate for the establishment of a fish-cultural station.

I know that the last bill that became a law Mr. SMOOT. for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Utah did not include those words.

Mr. JONES. That is true as to the last law, but we have had no law for several years. I know, however, that during the last two or three years such bills as have passed the Senate have all contained such a provision.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know it was recommended by the department. As to the limitation, I am perfectly willing to accept it in that form, and the State is willing to cooperate with the department to that extent. I do not think that it requires an act of the legislature, but it requires cooperation by the authorities of the State.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill being proceeded with.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment. ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRISON REFORM.

Mr. FLETCHER. On January 15 the Senator from Arizona [Mr. Ashurst] presented a memorial prepared by J. J. Sanders, parole clerk of the Arizona State prison, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration. I submit a report from that committee which I ask may be read.

The report (S. Rept. 225) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the memorial to Congress prepared by Hon. J. J. Sanders, parole clerk of the Arizona. State prison, as presented by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] on January 15, 1914, report the same back, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads without printing. The memorial is an argument urging the passage by Congress of an act prohibiting the restriction of a prisoner's mail by State prison authorities. It is accompanied by data relating thereto, and the committee is of the opinion that the manuscript should be referred to a committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter to determine whether it is properly one for consideration by the Federal or State Governments. If the mail regulations of State prisons are for the States themselves to determine, the committee is of the opinion that the memorial submitted ought not to be printed as a Senate document at the expense of the Federal Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the report may be agreed to, and that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report is agreed to, and the memorial will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, HANNIBAL, MO.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9574) to authorize the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. to con-struct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri. A similar Senate bill has been reported from the committee and is now on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed the RECORD discloses that the Senate bill passed last week.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senate has passed the bill—I did not know that it had been passed—I ask unanimous consent, then, for the present consideration of the House bill just reported by me.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, before that is done the Senator ought to ask that the former action of the Senate be reconsidered, that the bill be recalled from the House, and the vote whereby it was passed be reconsidered before he asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the House bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not see that that is necessary

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is mis-ken. The proper procedure is to pass the House bill and, after it has been passed, then request the recall of the Senate bill and move its indefinite postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt about it.

Is there any objection to the present consideration of the House

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the course I intended to pursue. After I heard that the Senate bill had been passed—I did not know that it had been passed—I intended to move, after the Senate had acted upon the House bill, the recall and indefinite postponement of the Senate bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can not do that. The bill has passed the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary situation is absolutely clear. When the House bill is out of the way the Senator from North Carolina can move that the Senate bill be returned from the House, and when it is returned the votes whereby the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed can be reconsidered, and the bill can then be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me the proper proceeding is to first ask for the recall of the Senate bill; but I am not going to object if the Senator from North Carolina wishes it done in the other way.

I wish to state that at the time I made the Mr. SIMMONS. original motion I did not know the Senate had passed the bill. I did know, however, that the Committee on Commerce had reported it favorably, and I supposed it was still on the calendar. Now, that I am advised by the Chair that the Senate has passed the bill, my motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill. I do not think it is necessary that the other motion should precede that and I withhold it until action is taken on the House bill.

What is the bill? I do not think the title Mr. CUMMINS.

has been stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the bill

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 9574) to authorize the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

I move that the House be requested to re-Mr. SIMMONS. turn to the Senate the bill S. 3625.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to hold that motion out of order until the bill is returned to the

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well, I withdraw the motion for the present.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. CUMMINS. I submit the views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee on Senate joint resolution No. 26, proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States so that amendments can be initiated through the action of the States or through the people of the States. The report is signed by or through the people of the States. The report is signed by seven members of the committee. It is brief, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and also in the usual form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the distinguished Senator from Iowa will ask that the views be read as well at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the reading of the report?

Mr. LIPPITT. How long is the report, Mr. President?

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say that the views are expressed by seven members of the committee, but they are different views. They are all against the report of the committee, but they do not concur with regard to just what should be done. I suppose it would take about three or four minutes to read the whole

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope it will be read. I should like to hear it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be read.

The Secretary read the report (No. 147, part 2), as follows:

[Senate Report 147, part 2, Sixty-third Congress, second session.] AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. CUMMINS (for himself and Messrs. Ashurst, Walsh, Borah, Nelson, Overman, and Chilton), from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following views, to accompany S. J. Res. 26.

VIEWS OF SENATORS CUMMINS AND ASHURST.

Views of Senators Cummins and Ashurst.

The undersigned Senators, being a minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, beg to submit their views upon Senate joint resolution 26, which has been reported adversely by the majority of the committee.

Aside from the provision for a constitutional convention, which is practically of no avail, amendments to the Constitution must be initiated by Congress by a two-thirds vote of each House. No matter how generally the people desire a change in their organic law, they are powerless unless Congress, burdened as it is with a load of legislation and hampered with its variety of interests, has the inclination to adopt the resolution necessary for the submission of the proposed amendment. A constitution controls legislative body representing the people. A constitution controls legislation, and it seems illogical to subject it to the judgment of the legislature it is to govern. The people should be able to initiate amendments to State constitutions which are limitations upon power, and much more should they be able to initiate amendments to the Federal Constitution, which is a grant of power.

The members of the committee who sign these views are not in entire agreement with respect to all parts of the resolution. Some of them are of the opinion that the legislatures of a reasonable number of the States should have the right to require the submission of an amendment, and that it is not wise to extend the right to primary voters to be exercised through petition. Others believe that the right of initiation should be given not only to State legislatures but also to the voters under proper restrictions. They are, however, of one mind in this, that there should be submitted to the States for approval or rejection an amendment providing that either a proportion of the States or a proportion of the people, or both, should have the power to initiate amendments to our Constitution.

Albert B. Cummins.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS. HENRY F. ASHURST.

VIEWS OF SENATORS WALSH AND BORAH.

While differing from some of the conclusions and principles asserted in the foregoing, I am in favor of an amendment to the Constitution permitting it to be amended on conditions much less onerous than those imposed by the Convention of 1787, and accordingly join in opposing the report of the committee.

T. J. WALSH. WM. E. BORAH.

VIEWS OF SENATORS NELSON AND OVERMAN.

I am in favor of so much of the resolution as permits the legislatures of the several States to propose amendments.

KNUTE NELSON. LEE S. OVERMAN.

VIEWS OF SENATOR CHILTON.

VIEWS OF SENATOR CHILTON.

The merits of the proposed amendment are many.

It is not strange that the States, as well as the people thereof, should find that a Constitution adopted in 1789 needs amendment now; nor is there cause for wonder that they feel that the existing method of making such amendments is cumbersome. The first gantlet to be run is the Congress, where the amendment must receive two-thirds majority in both branches before it can be submitted to the people. Under the rules of the Senate, one-third of the membership has the power to prolong a debate indefinitely. Thirty-two Members (one-third of the Senate's membership) can delay and debate a resolution to amend the Constitution indefinitely; therefore it is in the power of one-third of the Senate—even a less number, in fact—to prevent the submission of an amendment. I think, therefore, that to give a reasonable number of States the power to submit an amendment for ratification is wise and is demanded by the present situation.

I think the limit of time within which the States may ratify is justified by sound principles. It is altogether proper that a proposed amendment, after the lapse of five years, should die unless ratified. The submission of a proposed amendment to the people of the States, if the legislatures desire to do so, can not be objectionable, and no doubt that, with present conditions, habits of thought, and experience before them, the original convention would have adopted that plan. Anything which facilitates the expression of the people's will appeals to me.

The resolution does not abolish the present method of amending the Constitution. It adds another method, and would be used, probably, only in those instances where the people demanded the submission of the amendment and tired of the delays of Congress. By either method the same solemnity for ratification is required.

W. E. Chilton.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4373) to provide for a commission to codify and suggest amendments to the general mining laws; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 4374) to provide for the allotment of members of the Fond du Lac Band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 4375) granting an increase of pension to Francis V. Patterson; and

A bill (S. 4376) granting an increase of pension to Truman S. Bigelow; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 4377) to provide for the construction of four revenue cutters; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CLARK of Wyoming:

A bill (S. 4379) granting a pension to Charlotte Perry; to the Committee on Pensions.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES COMMISSION.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the following resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 263) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to inform the Senate whether the International Fisheries Commission, created under the treaty concerning fisheries in United States and Canadian waters, concluded April 11, 1908, have completed their work, and whether further regulations under said treaty are now or are soon to be ready for action by Congress.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, this resolution relates to a subject of very great importance, the preservation of a great food supply which is in danger of being destroyed unless there are some regulations adopted.

The treaty was made to provide for a joint commission to make regulations for the preservation of the supply in the Great Lakes and the whole St. Lawrence system. The commission was created, and agreed upon certain regulations, which were sent to Congress for its action; but there were a few subjects remaining upon which there seems to have been a failure to agree, or a misunderstanding, and the Congress never acted finally on the regulations which were sent in.

I know the commission has had the subject up, and has been dealing with it, but I do not know whether or not it has reached a point where the duty rests upon us to act. I am exceedingly desirous that we shall ascertain whether or not it is our duty now to go on and do something; and that is the object of this resolution of inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I offer a resolution proposing an amendment to the rules in pursuance of the notice given by me on yesterday.

The resolution (S. Res. 264) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved. That the above-named committees on expenditures in the several departments shall have within their jurisdiction the following subjects: The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands: retrenchment; the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of the pay of officers.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 6060. An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of allens in the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I gave notice the other day that at this time I should call up for consideration Senate bill 2860. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the bill.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, resumed the considera-tion of the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHER-

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the debate proceeds further, I desire to submit to the Senate some reflections upon a feature of the bill which has been the subject of some consideration heretofore, namely, whether the power of Congress to legislate in the premises extends to that part of the procedure of election commonly referred to as the nomination of candidates.

I am convinced that if those who deny that the authority conferred on Congress by the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution to make regulations concerning the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives extends to regulations in relation to nominations of candidates for such offices, will but concentrate their attention upon the actual working of the prevailing system of elections, they will—and I make the assertion with the very greatest deference—realize how impossible it is to maintain that any such limitation of the power exists. "Regulations" concerning the holding of elections are required, first, that an election may be held at all, and, second, that such election may be free from error or from the influence of fraud, duress, or corruption. The "regulations" which the Constitution contemplated the States should prescribe, or, in case they should omit to do so, or sufficient reason for its interposition should appear, Congress should enact, were such as should provide the machinery by means of which the public choice might be regularly and authoritatively expressed, and such as assured that such choice might be freely and honestly expressed, justly counted, and accurately returned. Really, the whole purpose might be regarded as embraced in a solicitude to secure a free and fair choice of the electorate. Our election laws, now elaborate and intricate, are a growth. They were developed as the ingenuity of those who sought by nethods open to public condemnation to thwart the public w enabled them to operate with a greater or less degree of success. Until very recent times no very direct provisions were found in the laws of any State by which the right of one who offered to vote could be ascertained. The solution of the question was left very largely to the determination of the judges or inspectors at the very time the vote was offered.

If in a particular State there existed no law, or if the law of any State was by Congress deemed insufficient to secure a just determination at the very time the vote is offered of the right of any individual to participate in an election, it can scarcely be doubted-indeed, it would be idle to assert-that Congress could not make provision to test the right so asserted. Since such provisions as had been made in the several States for the purpose of testing while the election is progressing the right of those offering to vote have been demonstrated to be entirely ineffective, registration laws have become all but universal. Under these the right of those claiming the privilege of voting in any particular precinct is determined in advance. A roll is prepared and none except those whose names are found thereon, sometimes with exceptions, are permitted to vote at the election. The right of Congress to enact a registration law applicable to congressional elections can not be questioned, such a law being clearly a "regulation" such as is contemplated by the section of the Constitution referred to, the purpose of which is to insure an honest election. It has been fully justified by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. (Ex parte Seibold, 100 U. S., 371; ex parte Coy, 127 U. S., 731.)

A method of election in vogue in earlier times, both in this country and abroad, required that the elector come forward and viva voce announce his candidate, the election officers recording his vote. The constitution of Kentucky once enjoined

Such a system subjected the voter to a multitude of embarrassments. Obviously he would often not act with the freedom desired if his vote was thus made public. That plan would no longer be tolerated. Secrecy was deemed essential to permit the voter to exercise entire freedom in his choice. The system of voting viva voce gradually gave way to the plan of voting by ballot. No one could doubt that Congress, recognizing the evils inherent in the ancient system, might provide that all elections for Members of Congress must be conducted pursuant to the more modern plan. Indeed, it has done so. It decreed by an act passed in 1871 that all votes for Representatives in Congress should be by written or printed ballot. Later this act was amended so as to permit the voter to record his choice by means of a voting machine. It now reads as follows:

"Sec. 27. (Votes by ballot or voting machine.) All votes for Representatives in Congress must be by written or printed ballot, or voting machine, the use of which has been duly authorized by the State law; and all votes received or recorded contrary to this section shall be of no effect. (Fed. St. An., 212.)

The plan of voting by written or printed ballot prepared by the voter or prepared for him, generally, by interested parties, affording abundant opportunities for perpetrating a fraud upon him, and, more dangerous, for the purchase of the vote of the elector, an abuse that became national in its extent and hisfrom its reaching even to the selection of a President of the United States, practically all the States passed laws which forbade and prohibited the use of any ballots at elections except such as were prepared by officers of the Government and were supplied by the election supervisors to the voters as they severally appeared to exercise the franchise. The essential difference between the Australian ballot law and the system which it displaced lies in the fact that under the former the Government provides the voter with a ballot on which appears the names of the candidates nominated by the various political parties, or otherwise among whom he is permitted to select, leave being given him ordinarily to write on the ballot the name of some person as his choice who has not been nominated in any way. It is not open to serious question that Congress might, if it saw fit to do so, make this method of voting Impera-Surely no candid mind, conceding its power at each successive stage of the route we have been traveling, can hesitate But when the Government undertakes to prepare the ballot, it must make some provision by which it shall be known who is the candidate of any particular political party. When the Australian ballot first went into effect in this country, nominations by conventions was the universal method in vogue. So the statutes provided usually that the officers of nominating conventions should be required to file certificates showing the party nominees. About the same time corrupt-practices acts were generally passed and made applicable to the work of conventions and to caucuses and primary elections by or through which delegates to the nominating conventions were chosen. These acts were passed in recognition of the utter futility of making elaborate provision for insuring the regularity of the conduct of the final election and to prevent fraud and corruption thereat, if the malign influences through which they might otherwise be perpetrated were left free to operate in the preliminary proceedings absolutely necessary to be observed in order that the proceeding thus provided for might be put in operation at all. Why Congress may not respond to the same necessities in connection with congressional elections it is difficult to conceive. Let it be admitted that Congress has pre-scribed that the voting for Members of Congress shall be by the Australian system as we have assumed it may. It has already amended the act of 1871 so as to permit voting by ma-chines. That act necessarily contemplates the operation of the Australian system, for the voting machines are devised in conformity to that system alone. Will it not be admitted that Congress might provide that in cities having a certain population the voting must be by machines?

The wisdom of such a law might be questioned; the power of Congress to enact it can not be. If, then, Congress should insist by proper legislation that the Australian ballot system should be pursued in all congressional elections in order that their purity might be assured, and it was thereafter represented, as the fact would probably be, that the legislation was wholly ineffective because the criminally inclined simply transferred their nefarious operations to the processes by which the party candidates whose names the law required should appear on the ballot were selected, could it be asserted by any candid student that Congress would be powerless to make any regulations controlling such processes? In what respect would such regulations differ from a registration law? Both are intended to accomplish more certainly the result of a fair and free election—the determination of the real choice of the majority. Both are reasonably calculated to attain that result.

It is conceded in the able argument of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Shields] that the word "elections," as it is used in State constitutions, has often been held, and by courts of the highest character, to extend to and embrace primary elections as well as those through which the ultimate choice is made. A study of the cases in which the more re-stricted significance was given to the term will reveal that not infrequently there were other constitutional provisions which seemed to require that the meaning be so limited. By what rule shall we determine whether the narrower or the wider meaning is to be given to the word as used in the im-portant section under consideration? Shall we be influenced by the fact that primary elections were unknown at the time of the adoption of the Constitution?

In the exigencies which have arisen in our career as a Nation it has been found necessary repeatedly to apply the language of the Constitution to conditions never dreamed of at the time of its adoption by either statesman or seer. Early in its history the Supreme Court, confronted with the necessity of laying down some rule by which the power of Congress in any particular case resting upon the interpretation that should be given to the language of the organic law, said:

The safest rule of interpretation after all will be found to be to look to the nature and object of the particular powers, duties, and rights with all the lights and aids of contemporary history, and to give to the words of each just such operation and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as may fairly secure and attain the ends proposed.

And then referring to the particular part of that instrument involved in the case before it, added:

How, then, are we to interpret the language of the clause? The true answer is in such a manner, as consistently with the words, shall fully and completely effectuate the whole objects of it. If by one mode of interpretation the right must become shadowy and unsubstantial and without any remedial power adequate to the end, and by another mode it will attain its just end and secure its manifest purpose, it would seem upon principles of reasoning absolutely irresistible that the latter ought to prevail. No court of justice can be authorized so to construe any clause of the Constitution as to defeat its obvious ends when another construction, equally accordant with the words and sense thereof, will enforce and protect them. (Prigg v. Com. of Pa., 16 Pet., 610-612.)

In the discharge of the duties before us we may very properly attend to the observations of Mr. Justice Story on the rules which had been worked out by the highest tribunal in the land for the resolution of the perplexing questions which so often arise touching the power of Congress.

At section 430 of volume 1 of his Commentaries, he says:

Government presupposes the existence of a perpetual mutability in its own operations on those who are its subjects, and a perpetual flexi-bility in adapting itself to their wants, their interests their habits, their occupations, and their infirmities.

At section 431-

In the interpretation of a power all the ordinary and appropriate means to execute it are to be deemed a part of the power itself. This results from the very nature and design of a constitution. In giving the power, it does not intend to limit it to any one mode of exercising it exclusive of all others. It must be obvious that the means of carrying into effect the objects of a power may, nay, must be varied in order to adapt themselves to the exigencies of the nation at different times. A mode efficacious and useful in one age or under one posture of circumstances may be wholly vain or even mischievous at any other time.

And at section 432-

In the practical application of government, then, the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the powers with which the people by the Constitution and laws have intrusted them. They must have a wide discretion as to the choice of means, and the only limitation upon that discretion would seem to be that the means are appropriate to the end.

If in the experience of the several States it has been found almost if not altogether indispensable, in order to secure a perfectly free and fair election, to assume control over the machinery by which political parties nominate candidates to be voted for by the whole people, why should Congress in legis-islating under a power authorizing it to make regulations conislating under a power authorizing it to make regulations con-cerning the manner of holding elections for Senators and Rep-resentatives, granted to enable it to insure a free and fair election with respect to such officers, be denied the right similarly to prescribe how and when the candidates for those offices who shall claim a place on the official ballot shall be nominated? Laws touching the manner in which candidates of political parties claiming the right to official recognition as such shall be nominated are as much a part of the election machinery as laws requiring registration. A compilation of the election laws of a State which should be wanting in those respecting nominations by conventions or primaries, if there were any such, could scarcely be conceived of by the ordinary mind. In view of the universality of such laws, one expects, as a matter of course, to find them in every collection of the election laws of any State. If we reject the rule that, in determining the extent of the grant of power to Congress under the section of the Constitution here considered, we are to consult the end to be secured by it and to inquire whether the purpose of the legislation is more certainly to attain that end, and whether it falls reasonably within the scope of the language of the grant, there is left no guide by which we may say what legislation Congress may enact to insure the sanctity of the proceedings in virtue of which membership is claimed in this body. Certain it is that, in view of recent history to which we can not shut our eyes if we would, unless Congress can legislate concerning the method by which party nominations are now made the power vested in it is a barren, futile thing and might as well be abandoned.

The legislation before us may be unwise. I do not share that view. It may be impolitic. I am convinced to the contrary. But that is beyond the power of Congress to enact; it can not, I respectfully assert, entertaining as I do the most profound respect for the learning of the distinguished Senators by whom it is advanced, be upheld upon any theory of the Constitution that would not make of it a vain and useless thing. I venture to suggest that they might wisely accept the principle embodied in this bill, that though Congress may legislate concerning nominations of candidates for Members of either House, it ought under all ordinary circumstances simply to give efficacy, if necessary, to such regulations at the States themselves have prescribed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the entire subject of the control of the Federal Government over elections has become one of considerable interest of late, and the subject may well be considered from the view which has been advanced by the President in his late message to Congress. The message, in treating of the subject of Federal elections and the control of the Federal Government over the election of Federal officers, reads as follows:

I turn to a subject which I hope can be handled promptly and without serious controversy of any kind. I mean the method of selecting nominees for the Presidency of the United States. I feel confident that I do not misinterpret the wishes or the expectations of the country when I urge the prompt enactment of legislation which will provide for primary elections throughout the country at which the voters of the several parties may choose their nominees for the Presidency without the intervention of nominating conventions. I venture the suggestion that this legislation should provide for the retention of party conventions, but only for the purpose of declaring and accepting the verdict of the primaries and formulating the platforms of the parties; and I suggest that these conventions should consist not of delegates chosen for this single purpose, but of the nominees for Congress, the nominees for vacant seats in the Senate of the United States, the Senators whose terms have not yet closed, the national committees, and the candidates for the Presidency themselves, in order that platforms may be framed by those responsible to the people for carrying them into effect.

It is not to be assumed that the President had not fully considered, both from the standpoint of policy and of constitu-tional power, the question of enacting a national primary law before his delivery of this message, and it is not to be assumed that he did not, as the result of consideration before delivering the message, come clearly to the conclusion that it was within the power of the Federal Government to provide national primaries for the nomination of candidates for the Presidency of the United States.

There is no suggestion made in the message with reference to a constitutional amendment. On the other hand, the inference to be drawn-and it seems to me the only inference that can be drawn from the message-is that legislation alone is necessary in order to accomplish it, for the message says:

I turn to a subject which I hope can be handled promptly and without serious controversy of any kind. I mean the method of selecting nominees for the Presidency of the United States. I feel confident that I do not misinterpret the wishes or the expectations of the country when I urge the prompt enactment of legislation which will provide for primary elections throughout the country at which the voters of the several parties may choose their nominees for the Presidency without the intervention of nominating conventions.

ate the purposes outlined in his message. This seems to be a conclusion wholly different from the conclusion which it would seem from the language the author of the message entertained.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss that proposition to-day. I only want to say that if it be now the view of the President and his advisers that a constitutional amendment is necessary, no time should be lost in urging that constitutional We know the conditions which will confront an amendment of that kind, and this legislation can not be enacted "promptly" nor this purpose effectuated "promptly" unless we proceed without delay to the urging of a constitutional amendment, if that seems to be necessary. I do not express at this time a view as to the necessity of a constitutional amendment, but I express a most earnest hope for early action-whatever action may be deemed necessary to bring about the result.

I am clear in my own mind that the President did not have a constitutional amendment in view at the time, and I do not know that he has it in view now. However, I do not rise to discuss questions of a national primary, but to use it as a preface to what I am going to say upon the other question.

Whatever doubt there may be as to the constitutional power to do that which the President suggests ought to be done, there is, to my mind, no doubt whatever of the power of Congress to provide for the nomination at primaries of Senators and Representatives as the Constitution now reads with reference to the election of Senators. It is clearly within the power, in my judgment, of the National Government, under the provisions of the National Constitution, to control the election of the Congress from the first step to the last. When the fathers referred to the manner of holding an election they treated it as a unit, and whatever pertains to an election which in the wisdom of Congress should constitute an election, the manner of bringing it about or effectuating its final purpose comes within the purview of the language of the Constitution with reference to the manner of holding an election. If we think that the candidates who are to receive our votes should be nominated through primaries, then we make it a part of our system of Federal "elections

It has been said in the discussion here that some of the State decisions have given a narrow construction to the word "election." These State decisions are, to my mind, not conclusive, although they may be persuasive. They were construing a State constitution, and they gave to the constitution a narrow construction for the purpose of upholding primary election laws. But here we are construing, Mr. President, a national fundamental law of government, and we ought to take into consideration that when the fathers framed this Government they framed an elective Republic, a Government which can not exist without elections. When they came to treat of the subject of elections, they were treating of a subject which was vital to the existence of the Government, and it is not to be assumed, unless the express language of the Constitution is to the contrary, that the fathers intended to put into operation a form of government in which the question of the control of elections was absolutely vital to its existence without retaining in the power of that Government the control of that thing which was vital to its existence. We could not have a Republic without an election. The kind of Government which they organized could not exist without elections. And it seems clear that when they refer to the manner of holding elections they could but have referred to the subject as a whole and that the manner of holding an election could and would cover any step from the beginning to the close of the election.

As was said by Chief Justice Marshall in an early decision, there was no intent manifested on the part of the fathers to make the National Government dependent for its existence upon subordinate governments; there was no intent on their part to organize a Government which depended for its existence upon the volition or the will of another Government. Whatever powers were granted to the National Government were intended to be exercised from that standpoint. As was said by Marshall:

No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the Government of the Union on those of the States for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends. To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it can not control, which another Government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the result of its measures uncertain, and create a dependence on other governments, which might disappoint its most important designs, and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution.

Here was a Government organized which could not start and could not continue or maintain itself for a fortnight without elections. It came into existence by virtue of them. To say that the National Government can not determine the manner of holding elections, from the beginning to the end, in order to protect the elections from all those influences which tend to corrupt and destroy a Government, or to secure the best possible public servants, is to withhold from the National Government a most vital element of national existence.

It has been said, of course, that there were no primaries at the time of the adoption of the National Constitution, and that, therefore, the fathers could not have had in contemplation the question of a primary when they referred to elections. Certainly not; there were no primaries; but they did not undertake, in making a Constitution, to prepare a schedule of the things which might be done under that Constitution. They were preparing an instrument for a living, progressive, active, dominant, aggressive people which granted general powers, and with those general powers followed those things which were necessary and essential to the execution of those powers. Customs, habits, and conditions would change, and though changed the general subject matter covered by the grant covers all things necessary to be done under the change.

When the fathers said that the National Government should control or direct the manner of holding elections, as with reference to many other matters with which they dealt, they had in contemplation not an election of the seventeenth or eighteenth century, but such an election as changed conditions and environments and the progress of humanity might work out to a final and effective conclusion. At that time we had no telegraph, we had no telephone, we had no railways; yet would anyone say that the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution should be confined in its operation to the manner of transportation which existed at the time of the framing of the Constitution? As stated by the Supreme Court:

Constitutional provisions do not change, but their operation extends to new matters as the modes of business and the habits of life of the people vary with each succeeding generation.

It is immaterial what constituted an election in the morning of the eighteenth century; it is wholly immaterial under the conditions as they then existed; but whatever constitutes an election to-day in the contemplation of the people, whatever constitutes a method, the wisest and most effective which can be had for securing the best possible public servants, is just as much a part of an election under that provision of the Constitution as any step in an election in the simpler form was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

I call attention, Mr. President, to some language found in the case of ex parte Yarbrough, which, it seems to me, we may at least consider in connection with this subject, although, of course, the specific question was not then before the court. The line of argument, however, and the principle adopted by the court can not be other than instructive at this time. The court said:

That a government whose essential character is republican, whose executive head and legislative body are both elective, whose most numerous and powerful branch of the legislature is elected by the people directly, has no power by appropriate laws to secure this election from the influence of violence, of corruption, and of fraud, is a proposition so startling as to arrest attention and demand the gravest consideration.

If this Government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, each of which is superior to the General Government, it must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends from violence and corruption.

Mr. President, as we have progressed from time to time we have found that one of the most effective means by which we secure desirable results of the ultimate facts in an election is to control the manner of nominating the candidates. It is now regarded by all parties as an essential part of the correct machinery and modus operandi of holding an election, and all of the State decisions which have been referred to and cited as in opposition to this proposition nevertheless treat a primary as a part of the machinery of an election. It is one of the steps which is taken, an essential and a necessary step which is taken, to secure a desirable ultimate result. It is therefore well within the reasoning of the Yarbrough case to say that it could not have been in the contemplation of the fathers that they were forming an elective republic and not giving to those who would come in after years the means of absolutely protecting from beginning to end the method of selecting those who were to conduct the public affairs of that republic.

In my humble judgment, Mr. President, the Congress of the United States has as complete control over the manner and method of electing a Federal elective officer from the first step to the last as a State has control over its elective officers, and that which is deemed an election under a State law can be no less than an election under a Federal law, and that which is desirable and essential to bring about a proper election under a State law must, by the same parity of reasoning, be considered as desirable in bringing about a proper election under a Federal law. Therefore we are not permitted to construe the word "election" within the narrow limits which would relate solely to the ultimate result or the final step by which the officer was selected. In other words, as Mr. Webster said in treating of the commerce clause, when the fathers referred to the subject 'commerce," they referred to it as a unit encompassing every part of the subject as an entirety and not merely a part of it; not the last step, the middle step, or the beginning, but the entire subject was turned over to the Congress. The subject "Elections" is treated as a unit, and primaries are now an essential part of a twentieth-century election.

In the case of Ex Parte Siebold the court said:

In the case of Ex Parte Siebold the court said:

In view of the fact that Congress has plenary and paramount jurisdiction over the whole subject, it seems almost absurd to say that an officer who receives or has custody of the ballots given for a Representative owes no duty to the National Government which Congress can enforce, or that an officer who stuffs the ballot box can not be made amenable to the United States. If Congress has not, prior to the passage of the present laws, imposed any penalties to prevent and punish fraud and violations of duty committed by officers of election, it has been because the exigency has not been deemed sufficient to require it and not because Congress had not the requisite power.

Whenvery the court has approached this subject it has dealt

Wherever the court has approached this subject it has dealt with it on broad and comprehensive lines. We are to take no step backward.

Mr. President, when the bill which was known some years ago as the "force bill" was up for consideration, Mr. Tucker, and other distinguished and exceedingly able men who argued the proposition, did not argue that under this clause of the Constitution under which we are proceeding the power did not belong to the Government of the United States because of the narrow construction which is now placed on the word "election." Mr. Tucker admitted that if the State failed to act the power of Congress would be complete and that the National Government might take charge of the election, just the same as a State might take charge of the election of its own officers. In the mind of Mr. Tucker, judging from his argument, the construction placed on the word "election" was not to be narrowed down to what some now insist it should be, but that if the State failed to act the power was complete in the National Government.

The law which was passed, I think in 1870, took control, in a large measure, of Federal elections. Many things were done under that law which, in my judgment, would be far more difficult to defend as a constitutional proposition than the orderly and legal manner of placing men in nomination for election. The court sustained the law and sustained it upon the broad ground that under this particular clause of the Constitution the power of Congress was plenary as to the holding of elections, in order that the Government might not only have servants whom the people really desired, but that they might have them through elections relieved of all taint of corruption or misuse of local power.

Mr. President, I again call attention to the language of the Constitution:

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

In Article I, section 2, we find this provision:

And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Of course, Mr. President, it has long been decided and finally and ultimately determined by the Supreme Court that, while we can not fix the qualifications of the voter, while the qualifications of the voter are to be fixed by the State, as soon as the qualifications of the voter are fixed, the right to cast the vote is a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and is completely within the control and under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States; that the right to cast the vote, the manner in which the voter shall cast it, and the control of the casting of the vote is not one with which the United States Government has parted. The Constitution left to the States the fixing of the original qualifications, but after the qualifications are fixed by the States it then becomes a Federal The Federal Government may, in any manner it sees fit, prescribe the law which shall insure the exercising of that right in the manner in which the voter desires to exercise it.

Said the Supreme Court in One hundred and seventy-nine

United States Reports:

The right to vote for Members of Congress of the United States is not derived merely from the constitution and laws of the State in which they are chosen, but has its foundation in the Constitution of the United States.

Again it is said-and this is the Yarbrough case (110 U. S.,

But it is not correct to say that the right to vote for a Member of Congress does not depend upon the Constitution of the United States. The office, if it be properly called an office, is created by the Constitution, and by that alone. It also declares how it shall be filled, namely, by election. Its language is, "The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

That requisite is now provided for with reference to United States Senators. So, Mr. President, we have the qualifications of the voter established and fixed by the State, and as soon as they are fixed the right to cast that vote becomes a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, subject to the control and to the jurisdiction of the Congress. Congress may prescribe such methods and such manner as it sees fit for the purpose of having that vote properly cast and properly recorded. This is a most important proposition to bear in mind, as we construe the other provision of the Constitution with reference to the manner of holding elections. If the best method is deemed to be that of a primary, by which to secure the nomination of the parties, in order that the election may be properly and orderly conducted, in order that, in the judgment of the Congress, the best officers may be selected, that is one method which may be adopted for the purpose of exercising the general power which the Government has to protect its Federal Whichever view we take of the subject matter, whether we confine it to the one provision of the Constitution or take into consideration both, we can not do otherwise than conclude that a public depending for its existence upon elected officers must necessarily have control of the manner of holding the elections, and nothing but an express provision of the Constitution delegating that control elsewhere would prevent the conclusion that it is retained by the National Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have only a word or two to say upon this subject.

I have not the slightest doubt as to the power of the General Government, not only to regulate the actual holding of the election so far as that involves the machinery that is in operation upon the day of election and all of the incidents surrounding the day of election, but also to regulate all of the preliminary steps which lead up to and are necessary prerequisites of the holding of the actual election itself. I think that necessarily follows from the provisions of section 4 of the first article of the Constitution.

The Constitution provides that the Members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and, under the seventeenth amendment, that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators chosen from each State by the people thereof. In order that all the necessary machinery for electing Representatives and Senators might be in existence section 4 of Article I provides:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

I think there can be no doubt that under those three words, "times, places, and manner," every element which is necessary to an election may be prescribed by the legislature of the State. The mere balloting, the mere reception of the votes, the mere counting and announcing of the result is not sufficient. There must be, in the first place, voters who are qualified under the provisions of the State constitutions and laws to cast their votes. They are as necessary to an election as the actual depositing of the ballots themselves. There must be candidates for whom the voters may cast their ballots. They are as necessary under our form of government as the voters themselves, and they must be provided for by proceedings which antedate the actual balloting. So, under the provision of the Constitution that the times, places, and manner of holding the election may be prescribed, there can be no doubt that the State legislature may provide for the registration of voters, the nomination of candidates, and the appointment of judges of election or inspectors of election, although each of those things precedes the actual holding of the election.

Whatever the State legislature may do in that regard, under this provision of the Constitution Congress itself may do, because the provision continues:

But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations.

Namely, such regulations as the State legislatures are authorized in the first instance to prescribe. So anything which the State legislatures can do by virtue of this provision of the Constitution, necessarily the Congress itself can do, either by way of making the regulations originally or by way of altering those which have been made by the State legislatures, if Congress is not satisfied with the regulations which have been made.

wards repealed; but so long as it was in operation nobody doubted the power of the General Government to do that. Certainly if we have the power to supervise the registration of voters, which is a step antecedent to the holding of the election, we have the power to regulate the nomination of candidates. I can see no difference between the two things.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] calls attention, however, to another phase of the election question, and that is with reference to primary elections for electors of the President and Vice President of the United States. While I have no doubt whatever as to the power of Congress to regulate the holding of elections for Representatives and Senators, and within that power to regulate all the preliminary steps leading up to the election itself, I base my conclusion in that regard upon the language of the Constitution. When, however, we come to the provisions of the Constitution with reference to electors of President and Vice President we find an altogether different situation. The language of the Constitution in that regard is:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress—

And so on

In that instance the power is devolved upon the State legislature to prescribe the manner of appointing electors, and no supervisory power is reserved to Congress by the Constitution. The power is conferred upon the legislature alone. Congress is given no authority whatever, either in the first instance to regulate the manner of appointing presidential electors or to alter such regulations as the State legislature may make in that respect.

The absence of any such provision with reference to electors as we find with reference to Representatives and Senators is further emphasized by the affirmative provision in the Constitution, a little later along, that—

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

Taking those two provisions together, it seems to me there can not be the slightest doubt that the power of Congress over the appointment of electors is limited to prescribing the time when they shall be chosen, and that it can not prescribe either the place or places or the manner of choosing the electors.

Therefore it seems very clear to me that, while Congress has the undoubted power in the one case, it has no power whatever to deal with the subject of primaries, so far as presidential electors are concerned. Of course, we might pass a law such as the President recommends, but it would be nothing more than good advice or bad advice, according to the point of view of the individual who was looking at it. It could not be law, because there is no constitutional warrant for it. If it is law, it must be enforceable. How could it be enforced?

be enforceable. How could it be enforced?

The Constitution says that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," and so forth. Suppose Congress passes a primary law directing that these electors shall be selected at primary elections in particular ways, and some State chooses to disregard the law of Congress and appoints its electors in the manner that its legislature has directed, and it turns out that that is an altogether different method from that which is directed by the congressional primary law. Under the provisions of the Constitution, would we have any right to refuse to receive the votes of those electors? It seems to me clearly we would not.

Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I entirely disagree with the view apparently entertained by the President in this message as to the authority of Congress to deal with the subject of presidential primaries at all.

I have an amendment pending to this bill which I desire very briefly to discuss again, but I notice that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Shields] rose, and I presume he desires to be heard upon this question. Therefore I shall defer until a little later what I have to say upon the amendment.

[Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Chilton in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WALSH. I believe the general discussion on Senate bill 2960 has almost reached a close. I ask the Senator from Georgia whether he would not be quite willing to allow us to go on with it?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am perfectly willing that it shall go over.

Mr. SMIELDS. I am perfectly withing that it shall go over.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to conform to the wishes of the Senate, and if the bill which has been before the Senate this morning could be completed in a reasonable length of time,
I think it would facilitate the business of the Senate; and while I regret very much to lay the agricultural extension bill aside temporarily, I think I ought to consent to do so. However, in doing so I wish also to add that to-morrow morning, immediately after the close of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take up the agricultural extension bill without waiting for 2 o'clock. I understand from the Senator from Montana that this discussion will probably be over in an hour; at least I have been told so.

Mr. SHIELDS. I can not state how long the discussion will continue. Really, I prefer that the bill should go over. I do not wish to interrupt the unfinished business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Montana that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon], who has been profoundly interested in the bill he has in charge, is at present detained from the Senate by illness. Does not the Senator from Montana think it might be well, as there is no special hurry about this measure, to let it go over until the senior Senator from Georgia returns to the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. I was not unmindful, Mr. President, of the interest of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] in the measure. However, before he left the Senate, some days since, when he was complaining of illness, I spoke to him about the matter and said I should be glad to take it up at his convenience; and he then stated to me that he did not desire to say anything further in connection with the bill, and that I need not defer it on his account. If, however, his colleague will say to me that the senior Senator from Georgia would like to be here, I should hesitate very much to press the measure to a determination in his absence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know that my colleague is very much interested in the bill, but he has not said to me that he desired to have it delayed on account of his absence.

Mr. WALSH. Very well; as there seems to be some question about it, I shall not ask to have a vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to state that this is a Senate bill, and it has to be acted upon in the House. If not acted upon before the adjournment of the present session, in many of the States an extra session of the legislature will have to be called. I believe it would be a splendid thing for the Senate to act upon the bill at an early day, in order that the House might receive it and act upon it before the adjournment of the session.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there is a Member of the Senate who does not desire that the bill shall be acted upon during the present session of Congress. I do not think there is the slightest danger of Congress adjourning until we have acted upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope that may be the case, but the Senator knows that legislation in the House moves very much more slowly than it does here.

Mr. SIMMONS. A bill of this sort will be certain, I think, to secure consideration in both Houses before final adjournment. Everyone concedes the absolute necessity of some legislation along this line.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not do anything to retard the passage of the unfinished business, as the Senator from Georgia knows, but that is a House measure, and I am sure that it can be passed either to-day or to-morrow at least. Therefore I thought if there was no real objection it would be the proper course for the Senate to lay the unfinished business aside and finish this measure this afternoon. If there is objection to that, of course that ends it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to add to what has been said regarding the interest of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] in this matter, that he discussed it with me, and I do not think a measure has come into the Senate in which he is more deeply interested than the question of the control of the nomination of Senators by a law enacted by Congress. I am very sure that he wants to submit some observations upon the bill, and if he could be here I would be very glad indeed for him to have that opportunity.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of what has been said,

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of what has been said, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia, I shall move, then, that on the disposition of the bill now in charge of the junior Senator from Georgia the Senate will resume the consideration of Senate bill 2860.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana submit that as a motion or give a notice?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think a motion would be now in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can not make a motion now.

Mr. SMOOT. Even if a notice is given, if the Senator desires to give a notice, I wish to call his attention to a notice already given by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] that immediately following the disposition of House bill 7951, the cooperative agricultural extension bill, he will move to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 1. That notice is already upon the calendar, as the Senator from Montana will see. The Senator from Montana will lose no right whatever by giving no notice, and if the Senate desires to take up his bill at that time, of course it can do so.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire of the Senator, would that notice take precedence of the notice given by me with respect to the bill now under consideration, which follows immediately on the calendar?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the notice of the Senator from Arizona was given prior to the notice of the Senator from Montana. so, naturally the notice of the Senator from Arizona would take precedence so far as a notice is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. Then I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

COOPERATIVE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. I submit an amendment which I ask to have ton submits an amendment which will be read.

The Secretary. On page 2, line 10, beginning with the word "Provided," strike out the clause "That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established, the appropriation hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no money shall be paid out under this act to any State to be administered by any college in which a distinction of race or color is made in the admission of students, but payment to any State in which there are separate colleges for white and colored students shall be held to be a compliance with the provisions of the act if the funds received in such State be equitably divided as hereinafter set forth: Provided further, That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established, or in which there has been one college established in pursuance of the act of July 2, 1862, and also in which an educational institution of like character has been established, or may be hereafter established, and is now aided by such State from its own revenue for the education of colored students in agriculture and the mechanic arts, however named or styled, or whether or not it has received money heretofore under the acts of 1862 and 1890, above referred to, the legislature of such State shall propose and report to the Secretary of Agriculture a just and equitable division of the appropriation hereinafter to be made to such State between one college for white students and one institution for colored students, and when approved by him the share in said appropriations, as determined by such division, of such institution for colored students shall be administered by such college for white students, shall be administered by such institution for colored students.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I should like in this connection to send to the desk a telegram which bears directly upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, and ask to have it

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California sends to the desk a telegram, which will be read, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

OAKLAND, CAL., February 3, 1914.

OAKLAND, CAL., February 3, 1914.

Hon. John D. Works,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The northern California branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, representing the interests of 10,000 colored people and their friends about San Francisco Bay, urge you to vote for the Jones amendment to the Smith-Lever bill relative to the Government appropriation for agricultural extension, thus assuring justice to the negro in the South.

WALTER A. BUTLER.
Miss Eva B. Jones.
Miss Eva B. Jones.
JAMES A. HACKETT,
W. N. RICKS.

Mrs. H. E. DEHART,
W. N. RICKS.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered has been printed and has been on the desks of Senators for some time. It is changed in one particular. The amendment as I originally introduced it provided that the plan proposed by the legislature of the State should be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. I have changed that in the amendment, as now offer it, to the Secretary of Agriculture, so as to correspond with the other provisions of the bill.

This legislation, Mr. President, I consider to be of very great importance. It is intended to assist in the development of the agricultural resources of the country, and whatever development can be brought about in the agricultural resources of the country must redound to the happiness, comfort, and prosperity of the people. With the general purposes of the bill I am in very hearty accord, although I fear that the results hoped for will not come from its passage.

I think it very doubtful, however, if the Congress of the United States can afford to pass legislation of very great importance at the cost of making a great class of the citizenship of the country feel that they have been unjustly and unfairly treated by such legislation, no matter what its importance may be. As I view the bill, it will, as now framed, result in causing a very large class of our citizens to feel that they have been unfairly treated by the bill. In fact, I believe that under the operation of the measure they will be very seriously discriminated against. The purpose of my amendment is to prevent such a discrimination as far as possible. The bill now provides as follows:

That in order to aid in diffusing among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics, and to encourage the application of the same, there may be inaugurated in connection with the college or colleges in each State now receiving, or which may hereafter receive, the benefits of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts" (12 Stat. L., p. 503), and of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890 (26 Stat. L., p. 417), agricultural extension work which shall be carried on in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture.

It also provides that-No portion of said moneys-

That is, the money appropriated under this actshall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, crection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings.

I understand that under this act, if passed, during the next seven years there will be appropriated for the colleges indicated in the bill some fifteen or twenty million dollars, and this proviso is contained in the bill as it is now framed:

Provided, That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct.

Under that proviso of the bill I do not believe there will be any other than one result. That result will simply be that in certain of our States the legislatures will provide that all the fund going to the State shall be used by the white college in the State. There are 16 or 17 States in the Union that have separate agricultural colleges for white and colored students. In view of what has been done in the past with reference to appropriations made by the National Government, I do not believe there is any doubt but that all the fund provided under the terms of the bill and under the proviso I have just read would go to the colleges for white students in these various States. I doubt if the friends of the measure will even contend otherwise.

What has been done under the acts of Congress with reference to the organization and the development of agricultural col-leges? The act of 1862, which provided for the organization of agricultural colleges, gave to each State 30,000 acres of public land of the United States for each Senator and Representative in Congress. It was provided that the proceeds from those lands should go into a fund that should be undiminished. The income of this fund was to go to the organization, support, and the development of agricultural colleges in the various States. If any part of the fund was lost or misapplied, then it was to be made good by the State. There was no provision in the act that there should be any division between different colleges. In fact, there was no occasion for any legislation of that character at that time. As a result of that fact there was no provision with reference to the disposition of this fund that would prevent all of it from going to colleges to which white students alone were admitted.

The fund has been divided in this way: Three million one hundred and seventeen thousand and six hundred dollars has gone to the colleges where white students are received and educated, and $201,285, or only about 8½ per cent, to colleges where colored students are received. So under the original act a very large part of the fund arising from it has gone exclusively to colleges for white students, and the colleges for colored students have received practically nothing—as I said, only 81 per

The act of 1890 appropriated $15,000 a year and $1,000 additional each year for 10 years for the support of these agricultural colleges, until the annual amount appropriated would be $25,000 a year. This was to come from the proceeds of the sales of public lands. In that act there was inserted substantially the provision that is contained in my amendment. words, in the act of 1890 it was provided that a plan should be proposed and submitted by the State legislatures to the Secretary of the Interior for the distribution of the money arising under that act for the benefit of white colleges and colored colleges.

Under the act of 1907 Congress appropriated $5,000 additional, and provided that $5,000 additional for each year for five years should be added to the amount appropriated in the act of 1890, and thereafter we were to appropriate $50,000 a year for the support and maintenance of agricultural and mechanical colleges. That act provided that this fund should be used and administered in accordance with the terms of the provisions of the act of 1890.

So under the two acts of 1890 and 1907 we have had a fund distributed in substantially the same way as is provided in the amendment that I have proposed.

Under these two acts a reasonably fair disposition of this fund has been made. The income to the colleges under the two acts has been divided substantially as follows:

The colleges educating white students have received $609,521.63 and the colleges educating colored students $240,478.37, or about 28 per cent.

Under the acts of March 2, 1887, and March 16, 1906, experi-mental stations were provided for in connection with agricultural colleges. In the law providing for these experimental stations no provision was made requiring any of the money appropriated under those acts to go to agricultural colleges for colored students, and as a result none of the fund has gone to those colleges, at least substantially none. In 1912 in 12 States of the Union each State received $30,000 for its experimental stations, and not a dollar went to colleges where colored students were admitted and educated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator how much went to white colleges? Mr. JONES. Thirty thousand dollars went to experimental stations in connection with agricultural colleges for white

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. JONES. It went to experimental stations in the States-Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JONES. In 12 States it went where white students were Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all; they were not educated at the experimental stations. Mr. JONES. I mean they took the course carried on at the experimental stations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is not any course at the experimental stations. The experimental station is a scientific investigation of agricultural problems, the information from which all the people of the State are entitled to.

Mr. JONES. They are operated in connection with the agricultural colleges.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. That may be the case with some, but not in others.

Mr. JONES. In a great many of them they are. That is the case in my State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In my State there is a separate board of trustees, and it has no connection whatever with the State college of agriculture.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that there are three agriculture experiment stations in Mississippi affiliated, and in that way connected, with the agricultural and mechanical college; one of them is 100 miles from the college and the other two are farther. That they are under the control and direction of white men there is no doubt.

Mr. JONES. I find here in the report of the commissioner of education for 1912, page 358, a statement of the incomes of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts, and I find this statement of the United States appropriation for experiment stations:

Mississippi Agricultural and Mechanical College, $30,000; University of Missouri, $30,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to say to the Senator—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. These institutions are experiment stations. One of them is situated at Holly Springs, in the extreme northern part of the State; another in the western part of the State on the Mississippi River; another down in the Gulf coast section. The college is situated at Starkville, in the extreme eastern part of the State.

Mr. JONES. But this fund is administered by the controlling power of the colleges.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of course, as I said, it is under the control and direction of the men employed for that purpose, and it is affiliated or associated with the colleges

Mr. JONES. That is all I have said. That is what I have contended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rose to ask a question of the Senator from Mississippi. Is there more than one director of experiment stations in your State or are all the experiment stations under the direct control of one director?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think there is a director at each station. Mr. CUMMINS. I was under the impression that the experiments carried on in each State under the act were under the control of a single director.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that is the way it is in my State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the State of Georgia there is a board of directors of the experimental station consisting of seven men entirely disconnected with the agriculture college. The station is located in about the center of the State, and they elect scientific men as far as possible to handle the work of experimentation. The effort is to distribute the result of their investigations to all the farmers in the State. Negro farmers have equal access to information passed at the station.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the Senator from Georgia, does not the governing board of the experiment station, whatever that board may be or however it may be associated or disassociated with any college, elect or select a director of the experimental sta-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the leading officer at our station is called the superintendent and not the director. It is practically the same thing by whichever name he is given. There is a man at the head of the work at the experiment station. Then there are various specialists with him experimenting on the farm and experimenting throughout the State, but conducting their work distinctively at the experiment station.

Mr. CUMMINS. I supposed that was true in every State, that no matter in how many places the work might be carried on it was all carried on under the directorship or superintendency of a single head.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the white college of agriculture has no advantage in that station except that the men at the head of it are more capable of using what is done at the station. Everything that is done at the station is furnished to the colored agricultural and mechanical school and furnished to the white agricultural college. It is distributed to every citizen in the State who will use it. Local funds are raised, I think, to pay for pamphlets showing what they do; and not only is it sent to anyone who will take it, white or black, but the people are begged by the papers to write for it. It is simply a question of inducing them without regard to color to take information which the station can furnish.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further, and to whom?

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi. I think he wishes to make some suggestion to the Senator from

Mr. VARDAMAN. In reply to the question propounded by the Senator from Iowa, I will say these directors in Mississippi are selected by the board of trustees of the agricultural and the mechanical colleges. I want to say that the board of trustees for the college attended by white students is the same board of trustees that control the college where negro students are educated. There is but one board of trustees for the control of all the educational institutions in Mississippi, and as stated by the Senator from Georgia, the results of these experiment stations are sent out to all these institutions.

As the governor of Mississippi, I was ex officio the president of the board of trustees of the agricultural and mechanical college for the education of negro boys and girls; and I state that the same subjects were taught, the same experiments were made, the same opportunities were given to the negro boys and girls in the agricultural and mechanical college for their instruction as were given in the school for the whites. They did not make the progress the white students made, but that was not expected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator allow me just a moment more?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not questioning the fact stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Vardaman]. The experiment station accomplishes its purpose, so far as publicity is concerned, mainly by the issuance and distribution of bulletins. I was curious, however, to learn whether there were really three experiment stations in Mississippi or whether one station carried on its work at three places under the direction of one head.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It did not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to learn from the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] if he has inquired in regard to the report made by the experiment station in Mississippi, and whether that report shows whether there are three independent stations or whether the work is all done under one head?

Mr. JONES. I have not made any inquiries about that, but I think I can show very clearly that the experiment stations are under the agricultural colleges. I am not making any question as to the manner in which the work is done, as to whether the negro students have access to it or anything of that sort; I am simply contending that under the acts appropriating money for the experimental stations practically all the money provided by those acts has gone to experimental stations to which white students go and under the control of the colleges to which white students go. I think that is clearly settled by the language of the acts themselves, which I intend to read to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me a moment before he reads those acts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. Possibly what I may read may shorten this discussion a little.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will take only a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in the State of Georgia the governor appoints the trustees of the agricultural college located at the university and also of the experiment stations. They constitute entirely separate boards; they have no relation to each other. Having filled the office of governor in my own State I know that I named trustees to fill vacancies that occurred, and they are just as independent as the negro agricultural and mechanical school. The governor names the trustees of each, and there are three separate boards of trustees that control the three separate institutions.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, under the law providing for these experiment stations practically every experiment station in the Southern States has been attached to and connected with the agricultural colleges for which this fund has been apportioned by the different States where white students are admitted.

Here is the act of 1887. This was the title of it:
Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Not just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. This is the title of the act of 1887:

An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

So under the law itself these experiment stations are established in connection with agricultural colleges established under

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to say, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Just in a moment I will yield to the Senator. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. JONES. This proviso was contained in the act:

Provided, That in any State or Territory in which two such colleges we been or may be so established—

That is, agricultural colleges-the appropriations hereinafter made to such State or Territory shall be equally divided between such colleges, unless the legislature of such State or Territory shall otherwise direct.

And in practically every State in the South the legislature has directed that these experiment stations shall be established in connection with the agricultural colleges to which white students are admitted. There is the law, and that is the way it has been carried out in certain States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In reply to the Senator—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The law expressly provides that the legislature of the State can control it, and in the State of Georgia the legislature established an independent experiment station, with an independent board of trustees, controlled by neither of the two agricultural colleges, and the State furnishes equally to each the benefit of all information that is developed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the act does not-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. The Senator may say practically all," but I know that it does not take place in my

State; that is all.

Mr. JONES. The law does not provide for doing what the Senator from Georgia says is done. It says that the experiment stations must be established in connection with the agricultural colleges provided for in the act of 1862. You may have a subordinate board, but the experiment station is in connection with your agricultural college or the law has not been followed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They do work in connection, and the State furnishes both of the colleges all the information gathered, but they are not under the trustees of either in any sense, and the bill authorizes the legislature to give it that direction.

Mr. JONES. No, Mr. President, the bill simply authorizes the legislature to provide that in a State or Territory in which two such agricultural colleges have been established the appropriation hereinafter made shall be divided between such collegesthat is, between the State agricultural colleges—unless the legislature otherwise provides; that is, it can provide that it shall all go to one college, and that is what they have done.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think I can probably facilitate the Senator's discussion of this matter by simply saying to him that the money has been expended in the State of Mississippi-and I presume the same is the case in all the Southern States-under the direction of, if not of the board of trustees, the president of the agricultural and mechanical college where white students are taught. I say if that does not provide for it, the laws should. The money has been disbursed and the expenditure has been conducted under the direction of the white people of Mississippi; and for it to be permitted to be disbursed by anybody else would be a great mistake. I dare say that no man who has given any thought to this subject would any more think of turning the money over to the negro race to be disbursed than would the Senator from Washington think of turning it over to the Japanese in the State of Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator is going off into a line of argument which I have not gone into and which I have not even suggested. I am simply trying to detail here in a plain way how these expenditures are actually distributed. I am not questioning that they are not distributed properly; I am not even suggesting, and I have not suggested, that the distribution of the money should be turned over to any particular race or to any class; but I may refer to that a little later on.

As a matter of fact, the funds provided for experiment stations have been placed under the control and used in connection with the agricultural colleges in practically every one of the Southern States where white students are admitted. Of the total revenues derived under the acts of 1862, 1890, and 1907, $1,244,025 has gone to the colleges for white students and $269,154 to the colleges where colored students are admitted.

It seems to me plain from these facts as to what will be done with the money appropriated by this bill if it is passed as now framed. The money will go to those agricultural colleges where white students are admitted and to them only.

This is very largely true of the State revenues in 16 or 17 States in the Union. Of the total State and national revenues for these agricultural colleges in 17 States $4,926,979 has gone to colleges where white students are admitted and $926,306 has gone to colleges where colored students are admitted. I mean where white students exclusively are admitted and where the colored students can not attend.

As I said in the beginning, there are 16 or 17 States where they have separate colleges for white and colored students, and colored students are not admitted to the white colleges. In everything that goes to a successful institution the same disparity exists in these States with reference to their colleges. For instance, as to the white colleges—that is, the colleges exclusively for white students—their buildings are valued at $9,402,645, and the buildings of the colleges to which colored students are admitted are valued at only $2.291,020. Farm lands and grounds of the colleges at which white students are admitted are valued at $2,759,674, while the farm lands and grounds of the colleges for colored students are valued at only $466,076. Apparatus and machinery in the colleges for white students are valued at $2,967,868, while in the colored schools the value is only $390,772. The libraries in the white colleges are valued at $722,274, and in the colleges for colored students at $54,450. The live stock in connection with the white colleges is valued at $228,482, while the colored colleges have live stock of the value of $54,890, or the total value of buildings, farm property, live stock, apparatus, machinery, and so forth, in connection with the white colleges in these 17 States is $21. 516,100, and in the colored colleges it is only $3,841,769.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. In that connection, is the Senator from Washington able to give us the comparative number of people in the State of Georgia, of the white and blacks, or the number of attendants at the colleges?

Mr. JONES. I will make a statement with reference to that a little later, but possibly it might be well to refer to that right in this connection.

It was stated the other day, as I remember, by some Senator in the debate that the colored people do not send their children very largely to the agricultural colleges, or at least the colored students do not take part in the agricultural studies. The statistics show that in 17 Southern States the attendance at the agricultural colleges was, for the whites, 12,081, or 0.00068 per cent of the rural population, while of the colored people there were in attendance 5,689, or 0.0008 per cent of the colored rural population; in other words, a larger proportion of the colored rural population attend the agricultural colleges than of the white rural population.

In the State of Georgia in 1912 there were 423 white students attending the white agricultural college, and there were 568 colored students at the colored college, showing actually a larger number of colored students at the colored agricultural college in Georgia than of white students in the white agricultural college there. I do not know whether that meets the suggestion of the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. It does in part, Mr. President; but under this bill the distribution of the appropriation as between the States is dependent not upon the number of colored people or white people who attend these colleges, but is dependent upon the entire rural population. It may be that very few of the colored population attend the agricultural schools.

Mr. JONES. I have just shown that a greater proportion of the colored rural population attend those schools than of the white rural population.

Mr. WORKS. In some of the States; yes.

Mr. JONES. In all the 17 States to which I have referred. Mr. WORKS. Then that meets the question I had in mind.

Mr. JONES. It is true in the whole 17 States. It has been suggested that there are no colored teacher

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I inquire of the Senator what are his figures for the 17 States, and to which 17 States does he

Mr. JONES. I will name the States. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does that make 17?
Mr. JONES. I think so; at least those are the States. The percentage of rural white population attending the agricultural schools is 0.00068 of 1 per cent-I have pretty nearly forgotten my arithmetic, and I do not know whether I read the figures correctly; but there is a decimal point, then three ciphers, and then 68. That will give it to the Senator. The per centum of rural colored population attending these colleges is 0.0008—I know I am reading that right-0.0008; in other words, nearly 0.0002 greater than of the whites.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator give me the total of each and let me work out my own percentage?

Mr. JONES. Certainly. There are 12.081 white students in the white agricultural colleges in the 17 States named and 5,689 colored students in the colored agricultural colleges. The figures are taken from the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1912, volume 2, pages 344 and 356,

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a little difficult to see the significance of the figures when so many States are grouped together. the Senator from Washington take one State, as he did a moment ago in the case of Georgia, and state again the number of students in the white agricultural college and the number in the colored agricultural college; and also, in connection with that statement, give the revenue from all sources of the white college and the revenue of the colored college?

Mr. JONES. In that State?

Mr. CUMMINS. In that State.
Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I can very soon give the percentage of students, but whether I can give the total income of particular schools I am not prepared to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Senator stated it awhile ago. Mr. JONES. I gave the total of all the colleges in the aggregate without separating a particular one, but I think I can give here what the Senator desires. I can give the total income for the one year, 1912, at any rate. In Georgia, in 1912, at the white school there were 423 students; that was 0.0003 per cent of the white rural population. The number of colored students was 568, and that was 0.0005 per cent of the colored rural population. The total income of the agricultural college for the whites in Georgia in 1912 was $249,656, made up of State and national appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator give those figures again?

Mr. JONES. The total income from State and national sources of the agricultural college for the whites in Georgia in 1912 was $249,656. Of that amount $50,287 were United States funds and $182,900 State funds. The total income of the colored college in 1912 was $24,667, of which $16,667 was from the United States and $8,000 from the State.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does that mean that they were trying to teach 500 colored students on $24,000 and 400 white students on $240,000, in round numbers?

Mr. JONES. I assume that to be correct. Mr. CUMMINS. That seems to me a very startling dis-

Mr. JONES. The Senator will find with reference to a good many of the schools in the different Southern States a disparity very much like that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. Certainly. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is no doubt aware that this is an agricultural and industrial appropriation. Does he Lnow whether in Georgia the two are combined or whether there are two separate institutions?

Mr. JONES. I do not understand what the Senator means. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Whether there is a separate industrial college and a separate agricultural college for whites?

Mr. JONES. I am referring to the agricultural and mechanic arts school.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know whether the mechanical part is separated from the agricultural part or is in the same institution?

Mr. JONES. I do not know what separation the State legis-I simply take the statistics furnished by the Commissioner of Education, which show the amount of money spent for the white agricultural and mechanical school in the State of Georgia as being two hundred and forty-old thousand

Mr. 3MITH of Georgia. Will the Senator cite me to any Government report which shows that there are only 423 students in both our agricultural and mechanical colleges for whites?

Mr. JONES. The report of the Commissioner of Education for 1912.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will state to the Senate that there are over 600 students in our mechanical college alone.

Mr. JONES. Is that in connection with your agricultural

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is in connection with this appropriation. We separate in Georgia our agricultural college and our mechanical school. Instead of conducting together an agricultural and a mechanical school for whites, we separate them, and we have a technological school in which there are over 600 students and an agricultural college in which there are over 400. At the colored agricultural and industrial school we have found

It impossible to accomplish anything by separation. It has been found impossible to induce any large number to take the agricultural course, and it is practically an industrial school.

Mr. CUMMINS. That answers the question I was about to ask, which was whether the colored school was likewise divided?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. We have a number of separate industrial schools for colored boys in Georgia which are supported largely by private subscriptions. We have a number of industrial schools for the negroes, but we do not separate the funds of our colored agricultural and mechanical school. We wanted to develop that into a distinctive agricultural school, but we have not succeeded in doing so; we have not been able to keep them out of the industries. We have a number of separate industrial schools for negro boys provided for by State appropriations and private subscriptions, but we do not separate this fund, because we have never been able to develop enough of them in the agricultural line to make it an agricultural school. The boys in that school are from the cities just as well as from the country.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Georgia is much more familiar with the details in connection with the administration of those colleges than I am, but I believe if there was more encouragement given and more incentive held out to the colored students, the colored boys and girls in the South, there would be many more of them in the agricultural schools than there are now. That point I shall touch on probably just a little later on. These agricultural colleges have These agricultural colleges have been organized and largely supported by national appropriations, and I assume that the national law has been complied with.

It was suggested in the debate a few days ago that there are very few of the colored people who are capable of teaching the colored students in agriculture. That probably has resulted from the condition of things which the Senator from Georgia has just now suggested, that they can not get the colored boys and girls to take up or to study agriculture. I think possibly that results very largely from the lack of incentive to take it up. They do not know whether or not, if they do fit themselves for that work, they will have opportunity to use the education which they get. It seems to me that if we hold out to them the incentive that when they do fit themselves they will be permitted to engage in that line of work or that profession in which they desire to enter we shall have a great many more of them attending the colleges than there are now. Close the door of opportunity to white or black and you dwarf growth and development.
